Daniel Frohman's Lyceum Company opens at the Baldwin June 21st, in "The Prisoner of Zenda," which will be followed by Mrs. Burnett's "The Frst Gentleman of Europe," Louis N. Parker's "The Mayflower," and Sydney Grundy's new comedy, "The Late Mr. Costello."

The play at Morosco's next week, "In the Heart of the Storm," is taken up principally with earthquakes, floods and flashes of lightning. The scene is among the everglades of Florida, the Ponce de Leon at St. Augustine, and Charleston during the time of the great earthquake, in which the villain finally receives retribution.

"The House on the Marsh" is very different from the general run of Morosco plays; it is a gloomy affair, with very little relieving comedy. The setting of the first act' "The Alders," is remarkably good, the twilight effect on the marsh being very clever. The play calls for some strong acting, which is given most effectively by Lorena Atwood as the housekeeper, Maud Edna Hall as Violet Christie, Landers Stevens, who looks as well as he acts, as Lawrence Reade, Fred J. Butler as old Sir Jonas, and Mortimer Snow as Jim Woodfall. Miss Atwood's acting is worthy of much consideration.

Josephine Sabel, the petite chanteuse with the big voice, will be the feature at the Orpheum next week. Miss Sabel will be remembered for her clever work some time ago. Conway and Leland, two amusing people, termed the "Merry Monopedes," will make their first appearance in a novel sketch. Adgie and her lions enter their third week, and a special feature will be the feeding of the animals in full view of the audience. All this, in connection with Russell Brothers, Dailey and Hilton, Johnson and Dean and the Vaidis Twin Sisters should make up an unusually attractive performance.

Lorrimer Stoddard's new play, "The Question," will be given its initial production by the Frawley company at the Columbia Monday evening. The piece is satirical in tone, and treats of the fads and fashions of swaggerdom; the time is the present, and the scene Parade Park, otherwise Tuxedo. A novel scene will be the interior of a woman's club with the club in session, something decidedly new on the stage. Another special scene will be a fete in the club grounds, which, it is said, will suggest the Bradley Martin ball. The cast embraces twenty-three characters, and will introduce Miss Georgia Busby, a new member of the company, and also occasion the reappearance of Miss Phosa McAllister. An elaborate representation of "Shenandoah" will follow "The Question."

THE NEWEST BOOKS

Something About Plots and Style in the Latest Fiction.

The title of Mrs. M. E. M. Sherwood's new book of reminiscences is "An Epistle to Posterity," not "A Letter to Posterity," as it appears in the review of the volume on Page 12 of this issue. The "An Epistle to Posterity" is published by Harper & Brothers and is for sale at all book dealers.

A new life of General Grant by James Grant Wilson (D. Appleton and Company), has just been added to the "Great Commanders" series, edited by General Wilson. It can hardly be said that a biography of Grant fills a long-felt want, but the writer seems to be fairly frank in his treatment of his subject and has made a sufficiently interesting volume. The series of letters sent by Grant to Hon. E. B. Washburne, of Illinois, included in the volume, are of as much, if not greater, historical value than any others of that time, referring, as they do, to such famous battlefields as Fort Donelson, Shiloh, Corinth, Iuka, Vicksburg, Chattanooge, and the Wilderness. There are also in the book communications from Grant's surviving classmates, and several comrades of the United States Military Academy. Volumes in preparation of the "Commanders" series include General Sherman, by General Manning F. Force; Admiral Porter, by James R. Soley, late assistant Secretary of the Navy; General McCullam, by General Peter S. Michel, and Commodore Perry, by Richard W. Meade.

"The Beautiful White Devil," by Guy Boothby (D. Appleton and Company), is a somewhat fairy story of a genuine lady pirate, a sort of nautical Robin Hood, who possesses a wonderful steam yacht which can be made over at will, and an island kingdom in the Chinese sea, which she inherited from her father, an Englishman, who had been proscribed and pursued for unworthy reasons by the powers that rule in France. England and Germany. The "devil" is a most beautiful creature, is as chaste as Diana and as wise as Solomon. Her experiences are many and thrilling, too numerous for limited mention; she kidnaps millionaires and Sultans, and exacts immense ransoms as the price of their freedom, and in the end caps it all by a very satisfactory matrimonial engagement. For adventure straight and startling, and at the same time adventure very satisfactorily told, it is not necessary to go further than Mr. Boothby's book.

"A Pinchbeck Goddess," (D. Appleton and Company), by Mrs. M. J. Fleming, a sister of Rudyard Kipling, to whom the book is dedicated, is recently published in the Home and Country Library. The scene of the story is in India and the goddess is a young woman who has been brought up by a disagreeable old aunt, who very kindly dies and leaves her niece to do as she pleases, which she does by leaving her old home and its unpleasant surroundings, and seeking pastures new, which she manages to shock, and finally conquer by means of an assumed name, a vivacious manner, a wig and plenty of diamonds. At this period she is 31, and after a time meets a gentleman of the appropriate age of 38. They do as people sometimes do in novels—fall in love and agree to marry, and then and there with this satisfactory understanding, this somewhat ordinary, but readable, novel comes to an end.

A thoroughly delightful story is "The Burglar Who Moved Paradise," by Herbert D. Ward (Houghton Mifflin and Company). It is in the nature of a sequel to Elizabeth Stuart Phelps' story about Miss Corona and her seaside cottage "Paradise." Miss Phelps locates Paradise and tells about Miss Corona, and at the end brings in an old sweetheart, but omits the usual result. This omission is rectified by Mr. Ward, who brings about the marriage of Corona and the sweetheart, whom he dubs the burglar, and who effects the moving of Paradise by having it transferred on barges to a more favored spot on a Massachusetts bay. Mr. Ward's story is most agreeably written, and is full of original situations; the comedy is quaint and taking.

"A Loyal Traitor," by James Barnes (Harper and Brothers), is a story of romance and adventure, laid in the second war between England and the United States. It is written in the first person and purports to be the memoirs of a sailor discovered by the editor and published. The story tells of the sailor's early life, and of his later vicissitudes, and adventures, in which he is captured in a naval engagement and escapes to France, where he is pressed unwillingly by relatives into a plot against Napoleon. He escapes from this, and returns to his native land, where he joins the American service. All this adventure and fortunate escaping is fittingly climaxed by a successful love affair. This outline gives but a vague suggestion of the marvelous events that the book contains.

"The Pursuit of the House Boat," by John Kendrick Bangs (Harper and Brothers) is somewhat of a sequel to "The House Boat on the Styx." The story tells of the capture of the House Boat by Captain Kidd and his gang, and of the deliberations of the women who happen to be in the boat when taken. The story ends with the final rescue of the craft, the defeat of Kidd's plans, and the rescue of the women who have just decided on a supper party under the supervision of Lucretia Borgia as an appropriate punishment for the kidnapping Kidd. The interest of the book, like that of its predecessor, lies in the dialogue, which is often very amusing. The illustrations, by Peter Newell, are thoroughly in harmony with the story.

The life and poems of Edward Cracroft Lefroy, including Echoes from Theocritus and a critical estimate of the sonnets by John Addington Symonds, have been published by John Lane. The memoir is by Wilfred Austin Gill, and is a well drawn sketch of the poet's life, treating extensively of his days at Oxford and of his clerical career. The thirty "Echoes from Theocritus" indicate strongly the Hellenic ideas of the poet, his fancy for the idyls of Greece when the world was young. It is in the expression of these Grecian ideals, purged entirely of sensuality, that Lefroy strikes the note of true poetry—they are as pure and clear as a mountain stream, as finely cut as the most exquisite cameo.

S. R. Crockett has made a number of very agreeable moorland sketches in "Lad's Love" (D. Appleton and Company). The nature of the work is somewhat composite and is apparently the result of Mr. Crockett's desire to epitomize the various humors, idylls, loves and tragedies of moorland life in Scotland of nearly half a century ago. The places are real, being in and about Galloway, but the characters are altogether ideal. "Lad's Love" is fresh and charming, recalling in some respects "The Lilac Sunbonnet;" the local coloring put in with a fresh brush, and there are alternations of both humor and pathos.

"Sweet Revenge," by F. A. Mitchell (Harper and Brothers) is the very latest story of the Civil War. Most of its pages are taken up with the adventures of a Union officer who is pursued by a band of guerillas in the most approved guerilla fashion. A couple of Southern girls assist the officer in eluding his pursuers, who are finally dispersed by a troop of Union cavalry; a period of amatory misunderstanding follows, but the tale eventually ends with the usual tying of nuptual knots. The story is colored with Southern sentiment almost entirely; the dialect is well sustained and the characters are quite natural.

Harper and Brothers have brought out in very attractive form a reprint of Mrs. Craik's widely read novel, "John Halifax, Gentleman," with illustrations by Hugh Riviere. Mrs. Craik's book is as familiar almost as "Oliver Twist," and undoubtedly deserves the privilege. It has had the advantage of a wonderful circulation, which likely will be further advanced by the new edition.

"Wilt Thou Have This Woman?" by J. Maclaren Cobban (J. B. Lippincott Company) is very much a typical English novel. The characters and scenes are all familiar, and although the plot is somewhat conventional, the unravelling is dramatic and quite out of the ordinary.

PEN PORTRAITS

A Volume of Reminiscences by Mrs. M. E. W. Sherwood.

Though "A Letter to Posterity" (Harper & Brothers) is full of interesting reminiscences and makes a fairly readable volume, the critical reader cannot but think what an inimitable autobiography Mrs. M. E. W. Sherwood might have made had fate thrown her early in life into the custody of Charles A. Dana. Here is a world of magnificent material gone to waste for lack of literary skill. Surely no one of her time has had better opportunities to meet the great men and women of our time than Mrs. Sherwood. Her father, General James Wilson, was a brilliant orator and a man of personal and social standing, who enjoyed the friendship of Daniel Webster and his contemporaries. She grew up in a literary and political atmosphere, lived long in Washington, and subsequently in New York, at the critical time in this nation's history, and was on familiar terms with the ante-bellum statesmen and writers whose names figure so brilliantly in the story of that notable era. She knew Daniel Webster at the various stages of his career. She was a guest at Brook Farm, and met Margaret Fuller. She was a visitor at the White Mansion while James Russell Lowell was courting the beautiful Maria White. She knew Thackeray, when he was in New York; was at the Prince of Wales' ball at the Academy of Music, at the ball which Lincoln gave to General McClellan. She knew Mrs. Barbauld and Emerson, met Bret Harte in New York, when he told her how glad he was to get away from California. She was a visitor at the house of Bancroft, the historian; knew Charles Sumner, heard T. Buchanan Read recite "Sheridan's Ride;" was at dinner at the house of Prescott, met Agassiz and all the other members of the New England literati. Indeed, her opportunities have been inimitable, but she has little real skill at telling her story.

However, the remembrances of such a life could not fail to be interesting. Singularly enough, Mrs. Sherwood leaves no impress of her own personality on these pages. It is narrative, with but little flavor of an individuality. One realizes the writer must be prominent in society, must have a strong character and earnest views of conditions, yet one arises from the perusal of the volume with the faintest sense of what the woman is to whom all this has happened. It would have added to the value of the book as a document had its author but been clever enough to reveal more of her own identity. However, it is an inimitable volume to quote from. Here is Mrs. Sherwood's visit to Marshfield, the country home of Daniel Webster. She was then but a little girl, and accompanied her father, whom the great Daniel had pronounced the best stump speaker in America.

We had had the honor of receiving Mr. Webster as our guest in Keene, and he had asked us to visit him at Marshfield, his famous country-seat on the sea. To proceed thither to see our great hero, accompanied by a brass band, was rather exciting for a girl of thirteen, and to be met by Mrs. Webster in her carriage (all in white, a fine-looking, dark-eyed woman) seemed to me to be very distinguished. My mother and a friend were placed in the seat of honor, and I was asked to mount the box in which Mr. Webster was driving himself. To say that I was frightened as those big black eyes swept me up is to state it mildly; but I lived through it, and since I was young and small I was allowed the seat next to Mr. Webster on the driver's box. How elated I felt as my tall father put me up there, and he whispered in my ear, "Remember this, my daughter: you are to drive five miles with Daniel Webster as your coachman!"

It was the most impressive and attractive thing about Mr. Webster that all his friends called him always "Daniel Webster." My coachman, who was dressed in a plain suit of gray, with a wide-awake hat and a loosely tied neckerchief of red, began immediately to make himself agreeable.

"So this is your first visit to the sea, Miss Wilson?" said he.

I could have told him that he was the first person to address me as "Miss" Wilson. I was not old enough for titles then.

And so he went on smiling and showing me his splendid teeth, which were as white and regular as a string of pearls, looking down on me with his great black eyes, which were fabulously handsome. He pointed out to me Seth Peterson, who was walking along the road, and who stopped to take some orders from his fellow-fisherman.

"You will eat to-day some fish which Seth and I caught this morning," said Mr. Webster.

I was frightened to death, but I made a lucky hit by asking what sort of fish were the easiest to catch.

He launched off on his favorite subject, and told me of the gamey bass and the reluctant cod and so on; when I again said:

"I suppose you enjoy the fish which are the hardest to catch, don't you, Mr. Webster?"

He looked around at me and laughed. "You are beginning young, Miss Wilson," said he; "that is the remark of a coquette."

And at dinner he embarrassed me very much by repeating this conversation as a piece of youthful precocity.

Our drive was only too short, as we soon reached the long, low, pleasant white house known as Marshfield.

Mrs. Webster—a Miss Le Roy by birth—had very distinguished manners, and I felt awed as she received me every day with a lofty courtesy on the veranda.

The house was full of company. Judge Warren, a famous wit, was there. Mr. Webster laughed at everything he said. A great Whig demonstration had just taken place, and one man had put the flag in a sheaf of wheat as his part of the procession. "He didn't want things to go against the grain," said Judge Warren.

The dinner was profuse and excellent. Mr. Webster had dressed for it, and looked so grand in his blue coat and brass buttons that I was more and more afraid of him; but he grew more and more kind.

He offered a goose for the piece de resistance, and carved it himself with great deftness. He afterwards whispered to me that he was afraid it would not go round.

Every day for a week he gave me the honor and pleasure of a drive, and every day the company changed. I liked him best in the mornings, when, with his soft hat on his head, he sat on the veranda with his dogs and his friends, talking, telling stories, and being the genial and magnetic host.

He of all men next to Napoleon deserved the title of magnetic. His powerful face, so often described, so characterized by Carlyle, Macaulay, and Sydney Smith, was capable of the most lustrous and winning and beautiful smile I can remember. Had Mr. Webster been, like Charles James Fox, a professional lady-killer, he would have won every woman in the land. But I never heard that he went into the business of flirtation at all.

He could be as terrible as he was gentle, and we had a curious instance of his power. Mrs. Webster complained to him of the revolt of a kitchen-maid. "Send her to me," he said.

The housekeeper told us that he simply looked at her, when she cried out, "Don't do that! I will scrub the buttery!"

It was like a flash on sensitive flesh to have his black eyes flash their lightning at one.

Here is an interesting story that reflects the great personality of Webster:

I remember one anecdote of Mr. Webster's immense personal charm told me by Mr. W. W. Story, of Rome.

"James Lowell and I," said he, "were very angry with Webster for staying in old Tyler's cabinet, and as he was to speak in Faneuil Hall on the evening of the 30th of September, 1842, we determined to go in and hoot at him and to show him that he had incurred out displeasure. There were three thousand people there, and we felt sure they would hoot with us, young as we were.

"But we reckoned without our host. Mr. Webster, beautifully dressed, stepped calmly forward. His great eyes looked, as I shall always think, straight at me. I pulled off my hat; James pulled off his. We both became cold as ice and respectful as Indian coolies. I saw James turn pale; he said I was livid. And when the great creature began that most beautiful exordium our scorn turned to deepest admiration, from abject contempt to belief and approbation."

Mr. Webster talked one evening of his past, the past of the "Reply to Hayne." He told us how Mrs. Gales had saved it for him, as she could read her husband's shorthand, which no one else could.

The Whites, whose daughter Maria married James Russell Lowell, lived at Watertown in a great mansion, where Mrs. Sherwood was a frequent visitor. Here is Miss Maria:

But I had eyes only for Maria, the blue-eyed beauty, the genius, with eyes lighted from behind and the smile which seemed to illumine the earth! She was a predestinee. Consumption had even then marked her for its own, and although she lived fourteen years after that she always walked with death at her side. Perhaps a certain unearthly quality of her beauty was owing to the influence of this malady, which is known to cast a radiance over its victims. But Maria White had no appearance then of an invalid. Her skin was beautifully fair, with no hectic in the cheeks, no color save the red of her lips; her hair, which was very profuse and worn in bandeaux over the ears, was a rich auburn brown, and her eyes very light blue, with long lashes; her teeth were a feature by themselves, so white, so perfect, and so regular, a set of graduated pearls. She was not a large woman nor a small one, rather slender than otherwise, perfectly graceful and well-made. The expression of the face was rapt, spiritual, poetic. I never saw such eyes.

Thackeray is ever a source of interest. Mrs. Sherwood had frequent opportunities of meeting him, and evidently knew him well. She tells of his friendship with the Baxters:

I saw him several times during his later visit in 1855, and in company of Miss Sallie Baxter, who was the beautiful girl who suggested to him the character or personal appearance of Ethel Newcomb, at least such was the gossip.

I remember going with her to one of his lectures, and seeing Thackeray in the green-room before he entered. It was here he showed the playful and engaging side of his manner. Thackeray was a gentleman born and bred, and his polish of manner never left him, even when his fun would have made him boyish.

The hero after the war was General Grant. This story illustrates his simplicity:

General Grant's tour around the world made him so replete with delightful reminiscence that he talked more when he came home. I remember dining with him at Governor Cornell's in New York, and it was a very distinguished dinner. I told him that an English officer, who had been present at the dinner given him by the Duke of Wellington in the Waterloo Chamber told me in London that he thought him a very learned soldier. "Well, I am not," said Grant. "I had neither the genius of Sherman nor the learning of Lee or Macpherson. I only meant to get there."

Here is an interview with Ralph Waldo Emerson, which illustrates a phase of the great thinker rather different from that with which the world is generally familiar:

I had heard this great thinker lecture, but had never known him personally until about 1858, when I met him at a party at Mr. Bancroft's. To my amazement, he showed a curiosity to know "who people were."

James Russell Lowell who had the discernment to read Emerson's character, regarded his head as a well-balanced sphere. "One pole on Olympus and t'other on 'change" is his witty line describing this prince of dreamers, this "simple child and worldly wise, who so largely raised the value of real estate in Concord." I remember asking Mr. Emerson if Hawthorne (whom, with other young novel-readers, I was then adoring) ever went into society. "Oh, no," said Emerson. "It would take a forty-dowager power to drag him to such a party as this."

His great friend, the devout idealist Alcott, I never saw, although I read many of his "Orphic Sayings." Mr. Emerson brought nothing of this Concord atmosphere into society, but a great deal of good Yankee curiosity. When I asked for a Massachusetts lady whom he knew he looked at me with those penetrating eyes that seemed too far off to have recognized anything lower than the rings of Saturn.

"Well, marm, how did you happen to have known her?" said he. I had to give him my whole lineage before he was satisfied. I remember that he quoted Alcott. We were speaking of a certain President, whom we did not love, and his large majority.

"Oh!" said he, "Beelzebub marshals majorities, and multitudes ever lie." A famous "Orphic" utterance.

The chapter about New York society is readable. Here is an interesting passage about Governor Fish:

The balls outgrew the private residences, and Delmonico's, at the corner of Fourteenth street and Fifth avenue (now, alas! a carpet store), became the site for the Patriarchs' and the Assembly balls and the private parties at which daughters were introduced. One liberal gentleman gave a ball there at which he introduced a pond with live swans floating on the water.

"That is done to propitiate the Ledas (leaders) of society, I suppose," said a wit.

These beautiful rooms, many blue parlors going off in suites, were the scene of a fine fancy ball in the '70's. Mrs. Belmont was at the head of it, and it was enormously successful. I remember being received, as I entered, by Mr. Gracie King in a court suit, which he had inherited from his father, worn by Hon. Rufus King when Minister to England. He looked his part most completely.

The rooms were also the scene of a very good story told by Governor Fish of his own experience. The leaders of the german were not always very polite to the elderly, but of course they have improved since.

The Hon. Hamilton Fish, just home from Grant's cabinet, was doubtless our first citizen; he was the most amiable and quietly dignified and self-effacing of great men. He had accompanied his beautiful daughters to a ball at Delmonico's, and when they were to dance the german he retired to an adjacent parlor to await their pleasure.

A young man came up to him and said, "Want that chair, sir, for the german." The Governor gave it up peacefully, and retreated to another room, when presently another dancer followed him, and said:

"Have to get out of this, old gentleman. Want the chair for the german.

The Governor went still farther afield, when a third approached him.

"Will you tell me where I am to go?" he asked.

"Well," said No. 3, "if I were you, old man, I think I would go home."

MISS FRISCO

Brilliant Local Color at the Tivoli This Week.

"Miss Frisco" at the Tivoli is a good play gone wrong. Like Powers' "First Born," it has been written upon a San Francisco subject, and its action involves the fortunes and misfortunes of a number of well-known San Francisco characters. As far as it goes, the little opera is good enough, even though conceived along the lines of the broadest burlesque. The Exempt Firemen, the old plaza, Lotta's fountain and even the new Cliff House are all legitimate material for scenic representation, while the street characters, such as Emperor Norton, Father Elphick, the matrimonial-paper man and several others are all in the line of good comedy.

The management of "Miss Frisco" got started in the right direction—following the lead of Mr. Powers, who discovered his own city, as one might say. The public like to see and to recognize themselves anywhere, whether in novels or in caricature or behind the footlights. The promoters of "Miss Frisco" started right but they very promptly managed to get off the beaten track. The illusive will o' the wisp of advertisement lured them down a by path and it is to be feared will soon lead them to the arid waste of failure.

The scene about Lotta's fountain could be made very attractive were it not for the advertisements of corsets, cigars and daily newspapers that shout aloud from every flat and backing. While the scene at that certain place of amusement at the end of Haight street is as obviously paid for as the ads. upon the drop curtain.

These are the principle drawbacks in the way of the success of the "operatic melange," as the programme has it. But it is extremely doubtful whether the management can take such liberties with its audience and yet keep the piece on for more than a week. The public may enjoy being fooled, but at least it must be cleverly fooled—fooled in such a way that the trick is not too grossly apparent.

In other respects "Miss Frisco" is a jolly little operetta, and for this week at least is playing to the capacity of the house. The best scenes are those representing Lotta's fountain (barring always the advertisements), the Cliff House and the old plaza. Ferris Hartman as Tommy Nothing was easily the hit of the evening. The recitation he gave of "King Phillip's Fool" was dramatic and stirring enough, though one questions the appropriateness of anything so grim and tragic in the midst of comic "turns" and breakdowns. Myra Morella, despite the fact that her part necessitated the greatest number of changes of costume the writer ever remembers to have witnessed, "caught" the audience at once with her sprightly rendering of the title role.

Comfortably filled, but not crowded houses have been the rule at the Baldwin this week. The German citizen laughed ponderously over the witticisms of the diminutive Franz Ebert and Adolph Zink, but the ear unfamiliar with German took little enjoyment from it, for the entire performance is rendered in that language. True, both Ebert and Zink are amusing, both in facial expression and gestures, but the non-German-speaking portion of the audience was compelled to depend upon the eye for its amusement, and not the ear. "The Merry Tramps" is a spectacular play with four acts and eleven tableaux, written expressly for these little chaps as a vehicle for bringing out their specialties. They have an air-ship, an experiment with the cathode ray, harvest festivals, a dance of the lanterns, a manape, a ballet of silver laces, and all the gaudy, gilded and impossible things that go to make up an extravaganza and a spectacular play. "The Merry Tramps" is not as amusing as its predecessors, and unless recollection fails me, both Ebert and Zink when last here relieved the situation by holding many of their dialogues in the English language, a thing which it was unwise for them to abandon. The honors of the week were carried off by Ebert, Zink, Bertha Jaeger, Ludwig Merkel, Miss Toni Meister and Max Walter. The play is interspersed with music, dancing and specialties, and all in all the entertainment is pleasing.

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh That Contain Mercury

as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten-fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure, be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally, and is made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co. Testimonials free.

TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG.

The Tavern of Castle Crag was built in the heart of the Sierras, almost at the foot of Mount Shasta, and amid the most picturesque mountain scenery accessible to the tourist. The eligibility of the place selected was due to a rare combination of flowing water, inspiring mountain scenery and inviting forests.

The Tavern of Castle Crag, with its splendid environment, it was believed would appeal chiefly to those who seek a summer resort for health, recreation, outdoor sports, sympathy with nature and informal sociability. To emphasize this intention and signify the kind of invitation extended, the name TAVERN of Castle Crag was chosen.

To avoid all implication of sumptuous accommodations or the tyranny of social formalism, and to realize this original conception, the management has decided to make the Tavern of Castle Crag distinctively a family resort and especially attractive to those to whom health, recreation and sympathy with nature are paramount considerations. To this end rooms on the first and second floors of this splendid tavern with board will be furnished at a monthly rate of $65 a person; and rooms on the third floor with board at a monthly rate of $50 a person.

The accommodations of the Tavern are first class in every particular. Its parlors and halls are elegant and spacious. Its verandas are cool and inviting, placing the guest always in the presence of the most attractive mountain scenery to be enjoyed from the balcony of any tavern in the world.

The opportunity for out door sports embraces hunting, fishing, riding, bicycling, walking on mountain paths and driving on picturesque roads. The Tavern is located immediately on the main trunk line of the California & Oregon Railroad, and is fourteen hours' ride from San Francisco, twelve hours from Stockton, ten hours from Sacramento, thirty hours from Los Angeles and twenty-three hours from Portland. The Tavern of Castle Crag is reached from San Francisco and Sacramento without loss of time. The train leaves San Francisco at 8 o'clock p. m., arriving early the following morning for breakfast, which is always ready upon the arrival of the train. Returning, the train time affords equal accommodation. Thus, both in going and in coming the comfort of the passenger and the economy of his time have been studied. In brief, the Tavern of Castle Crag realizes to its guests the perfect ideal of that spring-time in the high altitudes of the Sierras which never becomes high summer, and is the comfortable home of pleasing recreation and restful repose.

TURF TOPICS

Jockey Club Programmes—Prospects of the Harness-Racing Season.

In the dearth of turf news on the Coast, rather more attention than has been warranted by the facts of the case has been given to reports regarding the projected race track in the neighborhood of San Rafael. There is no reason to suppose that any scheme of the kind is likely to mature, and as the running-horse stables have pretty well dispersed, summer racing near San Francisco need not be looked for. The poolrooms have failed to find cover at Sausalito, and their owners are now, no doubt, living in hope that the fresh attempt which is being made to get the Supervisors of this city to legalize betting offices will admit of their conducting their operations in the metropolis. It is needless to say that the interests of the Ingleside and Oakland tracks lie in quite the opposite direction, and the authorities of both are no doubt alive to the situation, and understand how to protect themselves.

The two local jockey clubs are at present occupied in laying their plans and preparing programmes for next winter's racing, the intention being to leave no stone unturned to still further improve the character and quality of the sport. In the columns of this journal we have previously pointed out that, as things have been progressing the last two or three years, there are practically no limits to the possibilities of California as a racing country. Of this Eastern visitors who attend our meetings are convinced, and as the attractions we have to offer become better known there is no reason why more foreign horses should not find their way here to take part in the game. The officials concerned are not losing sight of any possible opportunity to offer inducements, which would have this effect, and something may be done ere long in that view. In the meantime it is to be hoped any attention the subject may receive from the press may be judiciously bestowed and not be limited to suggestions and comparisons, which would only tend to bring ridicule upon California in the minds of practical horsemen outside the State. Racing men are conservative by instinct, and are not to be cajoled by sensational stories regarding the big chances to be put before them by enterprising promoters. Their policy will be to wait until they absolutely know what is coming before troubling their heads with the matter.

The great want in the programmes on this Coast is more long distance racing. Of races on the flat over a mile out of the 1,030 events brought off here last season there were only 140, of which again but 40 exceeded 1⅛ miles, namely 21 at 1¼, 3 at 1½, 4 at 2 and 2 at 4 miles. There can be no question as to long distance racing being most attractive to the public as a spectacle, nor any doubt that it serves to do more for the improvement of the breed of horses than short cuts can ever do. Will our racing caterers therefore consider whether it be not practicable to let us have more events at 1¼, 1½, 2 and 2½ miles? The last mentioned distance is far enough for all reasonable purposes. There is a sufficiency of one mile races, but there should certainly be more between that distance and 2½ miles. One of the great difficulties in turf operations at all times is to weed out the rubbish, and the simplest way to do this is without doubt to maintain a full proportion of long distance events. Four miles racing is very heroic, but experience does not favor its extension; and to accomplish the object sought we need something more moderate and of more frequent occurrence than is possible at that distance.

The publication of the entries for the meeting of the Pacific Coast Trotting Horse Breeders' Association, to be held at Oakland the second week after the close of the State Fair, affords satisfactory proof that there will be plenty of sport in the way of harness racing. A glance over the list goes to show that in point of numbers the pacing division is now just about on equal terms with the trotting section, while it is further noticeable that the smaller owners are not so overpowered by the representatives of the large breeding farms as in former years. This latter condition argues well for the prospects of harness racing, for the more general the character of the entries the greater must be the public interest. The free-for-all events, both trotting and pacing, have not filled, and it is proposed to reopen these stakes, which are the most valuable, the purse being $2,000 in each case. It is to be hoped the ultimate result may be satisfactory, as these races always attract more than local attention.

Entries for the two and three-year-old Futurity Stakes of 1899 and 1900, aggregating $3,000 guaranteed and divided into four events, one for trotters of each age and one for pacers, have been extensively made, a total of 146 entries altogether having been reached. The Palo Alto and Oakwood Park Stock Farms are the largest contributors, with twenty and nineteen youngsters, respectively. Santa Rosa Farm, D. E. Knight, of Marysville, C. A. Durfee, George Gray of Haywards and W. H. Stimson of Los Angeles have also entered liberally in these stakes.

The circuit arrangements are still unsettled, but Chico, Willows and Santa Rosa have all placed themselves in the hands of the P. C. T. H. B. Association, who will, no doubt, be able to arrange satisfactory programmes, with the subsidy at their disposal that is understood to be forthcoming from each of these localities.

Altogether the outlook for harness racing is more favorable just now than it has been for some time.

Accounts to hand so far this season go to show that horse breeding operations have been conducted with more discrimination than usual. A larger proportion of good stock has been bred and a smaller number of poor mares and worthless stallions mated than used to be the case. There is absolutely no sale for rubbish nowadays, and people have therefore ceased to trouble themselves with what cannot be turned to account. In thoroughbreds and trotters California is in the first rank, but in regard to horses for light and heavy draft, as well as saddle work, our standing is not good by any means. With one or two exceptions nothing seems to be doing to make it otherwise. Of course the local demand is but slight, but good animals are not dependent on that for disposal. The dealers will find their way here, if there is good stock to show them. Recent sales of miscellaneous consignments in the local auction yards have been attended with results very unsatisfactory to the owners.

BENEDICT.

The Duke of Argyle is said to have the finest and biggest piper in all the Highlands. Outside Inverary Castle his grace's piper was accosted by a certain nobleman with, "Can you tell me, my man, where I could get a piper like you?" The man ceased playing, and, glowering with wrath, looked down upon his questioner, and burst out, "There pe mony a wee lord like you in England, but there is na another piper like me onywhere!" And he marched off without vouchsafing another word to the astonished Southron.

Mme. A. Ruppert begs to announce to the ladies of San Francisco that she has recently removed to rooms 15-16, 131 Post street, where she hopes to receive the same patronage as formerly.

At this season of the year, when orchards are smiling and the grain-fields are golden, there are but few more pleasant trips to be found than a ride over the Oakland, San Leandro and Haywards Electric Railway to Haywards Park, where there is a comfortable club-house, and refreshments and music of the best quality are to be found.

A full assortment of the latest Eastern novelties at Gruenhagens, 20 Kearny street. Ice Cream Chocolates—a superior make—a specialty. Goods delivered free to Oakland, Alameda or Berkeley.

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

At a certain old-fashioned country church the clergyman was in the habit of thumping the pulpit to emphasize his words. One morning he had taken for his text the words, "Behold, I come quickly." During the sermon he repeated the text two or three times, bringing his fist (each time) down, not very gently, on the woodwork. Suddenly the pulpit and minister fell, burying in the ruins an old woman who had been sitting in a pew directly underneath listening very intently. Help was near at hand, and the old woman and the clergyman were quickly rescued. When she had recovered her breath a little, she looked up into the minister's face and remarked, quietly: "Oh, lor! I didn't think thee meant to come quite so quick!"

An eminent Scottish statesman, noted for his free views of religion, met after a long and fatiguing day's canvass, a dissenting minister, who was very keen upon the subject of getting the bishops out of the House of Lords, and, in pursuance of his favorite hobby, asked, "Well, sir, what are you prepared to do about the bishops?" The statesman, irritated and fatigued by his day's work, muttered, testily, "Oh, hang the bishops!" The minister bowed, and replied: "Well, Mr. ——, you go rather beyond me there; I canna' undertake to go altogether that length with ye, but ye shall hae my vote!"

An old-time Abolitionist in Illinois went to a theatre in Chicago and saw Forrest playing Othello. The stranger was not very well up in Shakespeare, and did not know that the tragedian was a white man, who had blacked his face for the part. After the play was over the friends who had invited the Illinois man to go to the show wanted to know what he thought of the actors, and he said: "Waal, layin' aside all sectional prejudices and any partiality I may have had for the race, blamed ef I don't think the nigger held his own with any on 'em!"

Mrs. Paran Stevens, the New York Society leader, had a drunken coachman in her service. On one occasion she was at a party, when her host thought it his duty to inform her that the man was so tipsy that it would not be safe for her to allow him to drive her home. Mrs. Stevens said very quietly, "Let me speak to the fellow myself;" and she went to the halldoor, where the following dialogue was overheard: "Are you drunk, John?" "Yes, ma'am." "Are you more drunk than usual, John?" "No, ma'am." "Let down the steps, then! I shall go home."

Prince Bismarck was once asked by Count Enzenberg, formerly Hessian envoy at Paris, to write something in his album. The page on which he had to write contained the autographs of Guizot and Thiers. The former had written, "I have learned in my long life two rules of prudence. The first is to forgive much; the second is never to forget." Under this Thiers had written, "A little forgetting would not detract from the sincerity of the forgiveness." Prince Bismarck added, "As for me, I have learned to forget much, and to ask to be forgiven much."

Lord Rosebery, when quite a young man, was in the establishment of an Oxford-street hatter, buying a new hat. While he stood bareheaded, waiting to be fitted, a bishop entered on the same errand, and mistook the Earl of Rosebery for one of the shop assistants. "Have you a hat like this?" he asked, showing him his own extraordinary headgear. The future Prime Minister took it from him, and examined it critically before he answered. "No," he replied, at length, "I haven't got a hat like that; and if I had, I'm blest if I'd wear it!"

A well known politician who affects to despise the fads of the leisure class, met a society person who is an eminent practitioner of golf. He inquired, with a wink, to a friend who was with him: "Say, Mr. J—, what is the difference between goll-f and 'guff,' as I believe it is called?" "Well, Mr. Q——," replied the amateur golfer, "golf is a game I try to play, and 'guff' is what you give us."

A government official in Washington politely inquired of the Secretary of the Brazilian Embassy, whose English is better than it is good: "How is your wife to-day?" "She's got a head on her," replied the Secretary gravely. They parted. An hour later the official had a call from the Secretary, who explained that he had made a mistake. His wife had neuralgia, and not the effects of a debauch.

One Sunday morning recently a collier, going up a street in Vancouver, met another pitman dressed in his "Sunday suit" of black cloth, but pushing in front of him a heavy wheelbarrow. "Hello, Jack," said the first, "what are ta doing wi' t' barrow?" "Well," was the reply, "I've lost t' dog, and my chum Bill's away, and a chap looks such a fool walking out by hissel'!"

In the early part of the Queen's reign a story was current that her Majesty once asked the Duke of Wellington what kind of boots he was in the habit of wearing. "People call them Wellington, madam." "How absurd!" her Majesty exclaimed. "Where, I should like to know, will they find a pair of Wellingtons?"

Baron Alderson, on being asked to give his opinion as to the proper length of a sermon, replied, "Twenty minutes—with a leaning to the side of mercy."

THE RICH MAN AS A MUNICIPAL ASSET.

The commercial progress and industrial upbuilding of a city are not things of chance or good luck, to be coaxed into being by nailing a horseshoe over the municipal doorway. Neither do any mysterious laws, the understanding of which are beyond the grasp of the ordinary mind, govern a city's progress. Good, wholesome, old-fashioned common sense, backed up by wealth and enterprise, will accomplish for a community, in these modern days, more than will the ordinary advantages of geographical location in the hands of a less enterprising community. If San Francisco is not as prosperous as the past has promised it should be, or as its natural advantages would seem to warrant, then there is something wrong with its citizens. We may not improve the favors which nature has showered upon us, but we may improve ourselves to mutual advantage.

A city is a corporation, nothing more, nothing less. Practically, all of its citizens are stockholders, and each is entitled to a vote and a voice in naming its presiding officer, its board of directors, and all the lesser municipal governing powers. Great power, indeed, all power, is lodged with the citizen stockholders. The professional idler upon the street, whose purse is replenished by soliciting alms, may vote to compel the man of wealth to expend his money against his will upon some useless municipal extravagance; or, if he be a Populist, may vote to deny to him the privilege of issuing bonds and assessing himself to pay for some needed public improvement. The "stockholders" govern, and the spirit of the community, indeed its very morals, are reflected in the public functionaries chosen at the popular elections. If we suffer a governmental wrong, or are inflicted with bad, unscrupulous or dishonest officeholders, the fault lies with the people themselves, and is chargeable to no one else.

Under the laws of this State, five or more citizens may erect themselves into a corporation for private profit. Each shareholder is entitled to a vote in naming the governing body of the organization, and its management, like that of the municipal corporation, is under the absolute domination and control of the individual shareholders. The object and the purpose of these corporate promoters may be development along industrial, commercial or agricultural lines. It does not matter which, but the success of the corporate operations will hinge upon the policy of its promoters, the spirit that dominates them and the business ability of its directors and its stockholders. Into such a corporation a man of wealth is not only welcomed and invited, but he is necessary and vital to the corporation itself. If a clique of stockholders in such a corporation should make war upon the richer members simply because they were the richer, such a proceeding would soon disgust the man of capital and drive him to seek another and more congenial environment. Such senseless antagonism would be, not only suicidal, but unreasonable, and unless a majority of the stockholders partook of this hostility toward capital it would not be tolerated for a moment.

The case of the municipal corporation is in this respect on all-fours with the private corporation. Under the laws of our State, any portion of a county, containing not less than 500 inhabitants, may become incorporated and have and enjoy all the powers and privileges conferred by law upon municipal corporations of the same class. By this means a definite and lawful city or municipality is constructed. Its success as a municipality, as a commercial center, as a point of shipment, as a point of trade, as a place of residence, will depend very much upon the wisdom of its governmental policy, the spirit that dominates its people, and the business attributes that live with them. Five hundred beggars gathered in one portion of a county could neither inaugurate nor maintain great enterprises, commercial or otherwise, while 500 enterprising men, with a sprinkling of wealth among them, might build a city that would reach magnificent proportions in wealth and population.

A very able man of sound judgment and keen observation recently asked the writer why this city did not make more use of its men of wealth. He spoke of the rich man as a municipal asset, and pointed out that the growth of New York had been due largely to the united efforts of her richest men, and that the public spirit of Chicago was due in the main to the harmonious relations that existed between such men as Armour and the enterprising but less wealthy mass of citizens. From time immemorial, ever since history began, not only in this country but in the older European countries, the growth of cities has been attributable to the men of wealth who took up their residence within them. Probably the city of St. Louis is advancing more rapidly to-day than any of her sister American cities: The moving spirits of that municipality have mastered the theory upon which great cities have secured their rapid advancement. The history of Chicago was before them as an open book, and under a combination between the great masses of the people, the mercantile life and the wealthy classes, St. Louis is to-day forging ahead with hitherto unheard-of rapidity.

Every man in a community may be regarded as an asset or a liability. The poor wretch whose shattered frame is stretched out upon a couch in our almshouse or county hospital is a charge upon the rest of the community, and is as much a municipal liability as is the maintenance of any necessary public work. Our broad stretch of harbor and our trade possibilities are municipal assets, but without money and enterprise to develop them they are just so much dead capital. The man of wealth who abides and has his home and fortune with us is likewise a municipal asset—not that he is merely a thing to be assessed and taxed, but in a broader sense he is of distinct value to the community.

The attitude of San Francisco toward its rich men and its large corporate interests is notorious throughout the world. As a community, we have inclined toward the view of the wrong-headed stockholders whose rude and profitless attacks have driven capital from enterprise. Point out a San Franciscan engaged in any undertaking of magnitude, and we will indicate to you a man who has suffered from one species or another of official attack and blackmail. The unfortunate capitalist who has an investment, the operations of which, or the rates of which, fall under supervisorial control, lives in daily dread and fear of the hungry and marauding public servant, who would wreck and ruin his enterprise for the mere lust of it unless something was forthcoming to satisfy his greed. We do not hold our rich men in proper perspective. Mr. Huntington, for instance, who has immense interests in this city and State, is permitted to visit us for a few months, attend to his personal business, and then depart. He is a man of influence in the East, and enjoys a wide acquaintance among men of influence in national affairs. He has proved himself a very successful agent for the railway company, and might easily be procured to advance our welfare as a city in particular directions, for the mere asking of it. A drive through the Golden Gate Park at the suggestion of one of the Park Commissioners, once brought from him a donation of $25,000, and as a result we have an artificial lake and a waterfall to beautify our public playground. To reap the benefits that should come with the possession of rich men, we need to mend our manners toward them, and mend them radically. There are districts in this city at present unsupplied with water. The corporation engaged in the business of purifying water would not be justified to-day in constructing expensive reservoirs and laying pipes to serve these sparsely-settled districts, but it is thinkable that, with better treatment, it might, in advance of necessity, construct these works, and by the mere doing of it advance the price of property in the neighborhood affected.

One does not need to agree with Claus Spreckels' position on the sugar question to find much that is reprehensible in the personal attacks now being made upon that gentleman. We owe much to Mr. Spreckels. If the beet-sugar industry has been developed in this State, and the world has been taught that we have here an undeveloped field wherein capital may with safety venture, we owe it to Claus Spreckels. If hundreds and hundreds of thousands of dollars have been put into labor, and the city's material wealth increased by the erection of handsome buildings at a time of unparalleled stringency in the money market, we owe it to Claus Spreckels. When the Valley Railroad was a languishing, expiring thing in the hands of the Traffic Association, it was Claus Spreckels who came forward and put life into the enterprise and made it a success at an outlay of millions of dollars. We may not agree with Mr. Spreckels, but we need not abuse him for caring for his own interests.

These are mere isolated examples, however. When the attitude of the community undergoes a change, once we come to regard and treat the man of wealth as a municipal asset, as a something to be "worked," if you please, for the good of the community at large, the more readily will you find him entering into the development of the municipality and hastening its growth and prosperity. The experiment is well worthy trying, for we have been pursuing the contrary direction without success for many years.

THE DESTINY OF HAWAII.

The question of what shall be done with the Hawaiian Islands is one that presses for prompt settlement. We have announced to the world that the Islands will not be permitted to become a possession of or to be subordinate to any other power. The real reason for this announcement is not the fact that the Islands are by settlement and sentiment thoroughly American, for such a policy would require us to assume paramount rights over any other region, the development of which might fall to the hands of our fellow citizens. It is the geographical position of the Islands alone which makes it imperative for us to prevent them from falling into the hands of any power that may one day be hostile to us. Our trade relations with the country are probably sufficiently secure from interruption for economic reasons, even if the Islands continue in their present independent condition, unless we legislate against our own interests. We have practically extended the provisions of the Monroe Doctrine to cover the territory of the island republic by announcing that he transfer of its sovereignty to any other power will not be permitted by the United States. If the Islands could maintain their independence under a stable Republican government, our citizens would probably be well content to leave them undisturbed; but it is apparent that they cannot maintain themselves against the increasing pressure from the Asiatic side of the Pacific, and their weakness as an independent sovereignty furnishes a constant temptation to any strong power with the fever for colonial expansion. It is because these Islands are the most valuable place of arms in the whole expanse of the Pacific ocean that we cannot allow them to become the prey of any European or Asiatic power, and, in default of their ability to maintain themselves, we must, in some way, incorporate them in our own territory.

No great nation of the earth is, probably, more free from the ambition of war than we are to-day, but freedom from warlike designs cannot relieve us from the necessity of preparing for wars that may possibly be thrust upon us. The duties which we have assumed under the Monroe Doctrine itself are such as to make a war in defense of that principle always a possibility. So long as there is any possibility of a war with any naval power—and in these days all great nations are naval powers either alone or by their alliances—so long will the possession of the Hawaiian Islands be an indispensable necessity for the defense of the Coast and of our trade in the Pacific ocean. The Islands stand at the crossroads of all the important highways of the world's greatest ocean, and when, if ever, the American isthmus is cut by an ocean canal there will be added another ocean road of transcendent importance by which the commerce of the East will pass to the Asiatic coast. On this road the Islands will be the half-way station. With the track of almost every ship that traverses the Pacific crossed or flanked at close range by this group of Islands within a week's steaming of San Francisco, the value of the group as a place of arms, a great naval station, needs no demonstration. With a fortified harbor provided with facilities for the docking and repairing of war vessels there, we could feel secure in the possession of the greater part of the great ocean. With a cable to furnish communication with the mainland we should have an outpost of incalculable value to our fleet and to the defense of our coast against a naval descent. The character of the population of the Islands and their remoteness from our coast have been urged against the advisability of annexing them. As, however, it is their value as a military station alone which make it necessary to annex them, and as their remoteness is really an element of their military value, that consideration may be dismissed. And, at any rate, they are much nearer to California than California was to the rest of the nation at the time of the conquest.

The difficult part of the problem which annexation will bring up for settlement is the character of the government which must be provided for our new acquisition. There is a natural reluctance to admit to our citizenship the bulk of the present population of the Islands, and equal reluctance to make a state out of a mixed population inferior in number to that of a very modest city. We have perhaps made statehood too cheap already, and the presence in the union of two or three derelict states has added nothing to the strength of our government or the stability of our politics. The territorial form of government is at best a temporary expedient, always looking to the development of the territory into state. The suggestion that the Islands be erected into a county of California may as well be dismissed as impractical. The Islands are wanted for national purposes, and their people would never be content under a county government subject to the whims and caprices of such Legislatures as are gathered biennially at Sacramento. California itself lived and prospered for five years after the conquest of the country by the American arms under a military Governor, and it was not until it had been made apparent that the influx of white immigrants was sufficient to ensure the continuance and prosperity of the state that a state government was erected. Why cannot the Hawaiians be asked to submit to the same test of development? As the group is needed really for military reasons only, let a military Governor be appointed to administer the affairs of the Islands, with the assistance of a local territorial Legislature. The District of Columbia, containing a greater population than the Islands, is well governed without any elective officers, and with only a fraction of Congress as a makeshift for a local legislature. Why cannot such a government be devised for the Hawaiians, who are soon to be our fellow citizens, until time shall have demonstrated that they have the men and the resources necessary for the making of a real state?

THE DEPRECIATION OF CAPITAL.

Mr. John J. Valentine, President of Wells, Fargo & Company, and a thoughtful student of economics, takes Mr. W. H. Mills to task for a statement which recently appeared over that gentleman's signature in an article on "Economic Conditions." The paragraph to which Mr. Valentine takes exceptions is this:

The depressed condition through which the whole world now appears to be passing has not arrested the tendency of unequalizing the distribution of wealth. The vast advantages of associated capital have not been disturbed. The underlying evolutionary force of the existing system has suffered no change. The largess of life, which appears to have been the patrimony of one class, has not been diminished. Hardships attendant upon the stringency of the times have been experienced only by one class, and that class the producers of raw material, and especially have these hardships fallen with oppressive weight upon the agricultural classes.

Practically this was the argument of the supporters of Mr. Bryan during the late campaign. The producers were told, not so gently, perhaps, as Mr. Mills puts it, but they were repeatedly notified in language vigorously abusive, that all the burdens, sufferings and hardships were being borne by themselves, while capital serenely glided along in safe waters, secure from the financial storm and profiting from the misfortunes of the unfortunate. This declaration had its effect upon some minds. It is a species or argument that is apt, if not directly calculated, to breed hatred among the producing classes.

Mr. Valentine declares that "to say that the hardships attendant upon the stringency of the times have been experienced only by one class, and that class the producers of raw material, is to make a statement widely divergent from the real facts of the situation, and hence likely to produce an injurious effect." He then cites the case of the Union Pacific shareholder, who bought, a few years ago, at one hundred and twenty-five dollars and higher per share, and was receiving six per cent. dividends on his stock, and who now can market his stock at only seven dollars a share, with no possibility of dividends, and he pertinently asks the question: "Has the holder of these shares, who is not a producer of raw material, experienced no hardship?"

He also cites instances of hardship that have fallen upon the owners of New York Central stock, of Santa Fe stock, of Northern Pacific bonds, of New York Central and Lake Shore bonds, and conclusively shows that credits have materially declined in value. Quoting from the Interstate Commerce Commission's report for 1895, he shows that the group of railroad lines operating in California, Oregon and Washington, Idaho, Nevada, Utah, Arizona and the western half of New Mexico, with a stock capitalization of $578,602,553, paid no interest on 97.54 per cent. of that sum, less than two per cent. on eleven millions, and six per cent. upon only three millions. Eleven hundred banks have failed within the last five years; some of them were compelled to assess the owners of stock as high as eighty per cent. in order to reimburse depositors. And he asks: "Have these owners of stock suffered no hardships?" There is competition in capital as well as in labor, and in that competition capital has suffered quite as much as have the producers of raw material. Mr. Mills' reply to Mr. Valentine will no doubt be interesting, and if it will bring out a public discussion of the question we will doubtless profit by it.

THE CALIFORNIA LAWYER

A Defense of a Much-Maligned Profession, together with Criticisms of the Conduct of Durrant's Trial.

The fame of the California lawyer is growing. The slurs and sneers of an ignorant local press are being copied in the East and giving to our State bar a reputation that is not altogether enviable, yet which is based, nevertheless, on qualities worthy of emulation and admiration. Because a lawyer is loyal and makes every effort that can honestly be made to protect the client and secure to him his rights, there are many to cavil and jeer, though they know that the astuteness of the attorney, his resourcefulness and his ingenuity serve as often to work benefit as injury to the community. If there are too many sharp curves and quick turnings to the law it is not the doing of the lawyer, but of the people, who indirectly make all laws. If procedure is intricate and the right of appeal too liberal, the remedy is in the hands of the voting citizens. But who shall say that lawyers are to relax their energies because their first move fails, who would call that man honorable who should desert his trust because one tribunal or a fickle populace thought his side in the wrong?

The California lawyers in their fight for wealth or fame never let go a case until the last card, produced from some hidden receptacle as a last resort, is played. Neither are they at a loss to find something new to turn up in the nick of time, so long as they can get a hearing in a case before some judicial tribunal.

This from a Washington paper came to us as an echo of the shouts that rise from the throats of the forces of disorder against a profession that has given more distinguished statesmen to our country than all others put together. The California lawyer does nothing more than his Washington brother does—he makes the best use of his brains to do that which he is sworn as an attorney to do. There is no distinction between the members of our bar and those of any other in the land, save that we may very properly and proudly boast a superior article in the line of lawyers. If our lawyers seem more persistent and hard to kill than those of Washington, it is matter to our credit, not cause for our apologies. Continuing his comment, the above quoted editorialist vents himself with much evident satisfaction in this fashion:

For ways that are dark and devious to circumvent the just penalties which the laws prescribe for the punishment of crime, California is entitled to the precedence. In that State, as in others under the system of elective judges, there has been permitted to grow up a mass of legal technicalities of the most trivial and nonsensical kind, and a system of legal procedure which makes it an exceedingly expensive and difficult matter to convict criminals charged with the most heinous crimes against society. In addition, jurors are approached by professional bribers, or the jury is stuffed. Barefaced perjury and subordination of that crime and every scheme of trickery and deceit are resorted to by attorneys to bamboozle judges, jurors and the people. The more atrocious the murder and more daring the robbery, it would seem, the better is the chance for the criminal's escape from the network of the law. The most brutal fiend who commits the boldest outrage against society, the most savage and repulsive murderers of women and children, seldom fails to have his female, as well as male, mawkish sympathizers to labor for his acquittal or his pardon after conviction. The history of the civil side of the courts of California shows also a lamentable state of public morals and of conscientious principles in the individual of right and wrong.

How all these facts, so difficult to prove, so easy to suggest, but as all judges know so slight in foundation, how these things come to be so positively known to our Washington friend we do not know. It is a fact, a lamentable one, that attempts have been made to bribe juries in California, that judges have been on the bench, a very few, who were suspected of dishonesty or partisanship. But this is the limit of our sinning so far as the unprejudiced observer can ascertain. And New York, old, respectable New York, that never saw a mining camp and never saw such a mixture of peoples as we have seen, has a much worse record, as shown by [illegible] newspapers and her reports than this wild and wes[illegible] outpost of civilization.

As to the Durrant case, which is the timely excuse for such abuse of our bar and our people as we have quoted, there is this to be said, that in the opinion of a large number of the members of this bar Durrant did not have a fair trial. The writer has talked within a week with possibly a dozen attorneys, who, while expressing no opinion as to the young man's guilt or innocence, were unanimous in the statement that his trial was not such as the bar contemplated. It was said by one that the Judge who heard the case was notorious as a public prosecutor, a man who by a wink, a shrug of the shoulders, a pose of body or inflection of the voice could convey the suggestion of his belief of guilt. Another lawyer thought the jury prejudiced, and intimidated, citing in proof the threat made to one juror that if they didn't hang Durrant the people would hang the jury, and the heated argument made by another juror to a neighbor in favor of Durrant's guilt, and this while the trial was proceeding and the evidence not concluded. Still another lawyer, and one for whose judgment all have respect, disclosed that never in the world could Durrant have been declared guilty had not the daily press joined in the prosecution with a license never before known in an English or American community. We all remember how for months after the arrest of Durrant and more especially during the trial, the most imaginative and vicious minded of the local reporters were given full swing in our papers. It was notoriously a matter of pride with the local police that Durrant should be convicted, and a man's life was made to hang on the more or less dangerous evidence of short-sighted old women. Altogether it is hardly to be doubted that if the same combination of forces—press, police and prosecutors—could have been brought to bear against Mayor Phelan, Rev. Dr. Dille or Prof. Harrison, it would have gone hard with any one of them.

Durrant may be guilty. There is much evidence to show that he is. But there is a difference between fact and proof. The law has for the protection of us established certain rules which are intended to guard the suspected against passion and prejudice. Those who know the law think that these guards were thrown down in the Durrant case and the man's life given over to the hands of an inflamed mob. Now, mobs are not always wrong, but mob law is not the kind we pretend to administer.

A few weeks since Butler was arrested in this city for crimes alleged to have been committed in the Australian bush. Pages were given him daily in our papers. Butler was taken back to Australia. The press of that fair continent reprinted much of this matter. Promptly the law came down on these papers, and with a warning that they should do so no more, not till the facts came out at the trial, and then not in comment, the papers were fined five hundred pounds each. If our papers had been treated so would Durrant have been convicted on the evidence offered? This is one way to look at the question of Durrant's trial.

To go to the U. S. Supreme Court on appeal on habeas corpus in such cases is not novel procedure. It has been done before, and in no case that we know of has this U. S. Supreme Court interfered with the judgment of the State Courts. The question of procedure involved in the appeal in the Durrant case is worth having settled, and when such a man as Circuit Judge Gilbert grants the appeal there can be little question as to the law.

All said and done, the California lawyer is a fighter for his client, and his practices are not more reprehensible than those of his brothers to the east or north. There is not another class of professional men, we are convinced, which contain fewer fakirs or rascals.

The average age at which people in England marry has steadily risen for a good many years. Sir Brydges Henniker, Registrar-General for England and Wales, has only now completed his detailed report for 1895, and he states that the mean ages of those who entered wedlock in that year were about twenty-eight and a half years for men and slightly over twenty-six years for women. These figures, however, include the ages of widowers and widows who re-enter the matrimonial estate, and who ought properly to be excluded from the calculation, for the average age of widowers who remarry is over forty-four, whilst that of widows is forty. If, therefore, we deal only with the case of bachelors and spinsters, we find that the mean ages on marriage are twenty-six and a half and twenty-five years respectively. The number of under-age marriages registered in 1895 was the lowest recorded for between forty and fifty years.

Not Guilty?

FROM THE FRENCH OF MARCEL L'HEUREUX

BY JUSTIN STURGIS

The accused was a young man, slightly built and of a delicate appearance. It was almost impossible to believe that he was the murderer for whom the police had been searching. He was positively frail; besides, he looked like a gentleman and was dressed like a gentleman — in appearance just such a man as might be met at an afternoon tea or an evening function. Besides, he was known to be wealthy.

Yet, in spite of all this, he was accused, and no doubt rightfully, of the murder and robbery of an aged couple living in a little hut on the Versailles road. Here was a mystery that was baffling enough. The accused had never so much as heard of his victims before the time of the murder, while at the very moment he was rifling their old-clothes press of some score of pitiful Louis, a bank account of over a million francs was ready and waiting for him at the Credit Lyonais.

When I entered his cell he was sitting at his little wooden table, his head between his hands. He turned about sharply at the noise of the closing door, and I introduced myself.

"Ah," said he, "you are the gentleman who expects to save my head from the guillotine," and he added, "it will be perhaps a difficult task, for I feel as if I had already lost it."

I examined him again with attention and surprise. The certain aristocratic distinction of his face, the intelligence of his eyes, and the air of refinement of his whole person, was absolutely incompatible with the idea of the crude and brutal crime for which he was imprisoned. And yet he had pleaded guilty at the preliminary examination. There was nothing in his actions or words that even suggested dementia. It was certain that he had done a murder, and it was certain that he had done it for robbery. But why this robbery? Here everything became obscure. He had no need of money, he was not in debt. His life hitherto had passed even delightfully, unvexed by any financial or social embarassment, untroubled by any affliction.

"Look here," said I, "you don't mean to tell me that your motive for this murder was robbery? There is a mystery here somewhere, and if I'm to attempt to clear you of this charge, I must know each and every detail of your case."

He rose to his feet at my words and began to pace up and down his cell. This movement brought his head and features into the clearer light that was filtered through the little grating of the cell, and I could see more clearly what manner of face was his. His nose was long and thin, the lips indeterminate, the eyes abnormally restless, small, bright, and wide apart; the chin was small, and I could fancy that the color would come and go in his cheeks with great rapidity. His gestures as he talked were abrupt, agile, and dramatically expressive of almost every shade and variance of mood. I am no great believer in the face and gesture as interpretive of character, yet for all that I was convinced that here was a temperament, sensitive and nervous, as delicate and highly organized as a tiny watch or musical instrument. But yet the man was absolutely sound of mind.

"Monsieur," said he, all at once, "it is true that I murdered the old couple, and it is true that I murdered them for money, but the crime was not accomplished on the seventeenth of April last as you suppose. I shall be quite frank with you. I committed it three years ago."

The air of sincerity with which this was spoken confirmed me in a suspicion I had begun to entertain, and I put my client down as one of those unfortunate monomaniacs, victims of one particular idea.

Why should he speak of three years ago? Had not the old couple been killed on the night of the sixteenth or seventeenth of the last month?

But he suddenly stopped directly in front of me, and fixing upon me a penetrating glance, exclaimed:

"No, Monsieur, it is not as you believe. I was and now am in full possession of my faculties. You understand," he went on, with some pedantry, "you understand, I suppose, something about reflex action. Pinch the foot of a rat after removing a certain part of the brain and he will squeal, or decapitate a frog and drop him into a vessel of water. He will sink at once to the bottom, inert, apparently dead, but if you can irritate one of the motor nerves in the upper part of the leg, he will begin to swim as if in a normal state.

"Well, there exists in the psychological world a certain class of phenomena, of an order more complicated and more elevated than these lecture-room experiments, to which, nevertheless, they can be compared, because they are in a sense mechanical and the result of the impulsion of exterior agents, foreign to our conscience. Under the sway of certain circumstances you will experience, for instance, a sensation of a certain order—a series of images will pass through your mind, and a train of successive ideas will lead you to conceive of a certain action to be executed; and you will conceive it with such an intensity that you will prepare for its carrying out in the smallest and most trivial details. Time passes—two, three, four years—chance throws in your way the means to execute this action that you formerly but dreamed of. You may have perhaps forgotten this action, you no longer have any desire to accomplish it, there is no longer any reason that it should be accomplished; yet this means of execution, just as the irritation applied to the motor nerves of the decapitated frog, acts mechanically upon your will, though beyond the range of your consciousness, and provokes and co-ordinates all the movements necessary to accomplish the action. You perform the action, you carry out the idea formerly conceived and planned—you do the deed in spite of yourself. It is impossible for you not to do it."

"Monsieur," he began again, after a short silence, "I have not always been the rich and happy man of whom you have heard. Three years ago I broke with my family, and, ruined by a life of dissipation and debauchery, suddenly found myself in the lowest stages of misery and degradation. I was crushed under a load of debt. Nowhere could I obtain a sou of credit. My friends deserted me. I had begun to starve—for days not a morsel of food passed my lips. One by one I underwent all forms of humiliation and contempt. I submitted to every insult—I pocketed every slight. And it was then at length that I fell a prey to a distorted and perverted imagination—an imagination which is never more brilliant than when the body is weakened—an imagination that clutches at empty dreams of fortune quickly made, and that runs riot after all manner of chimerical adventure, at once splendid and ignoble.

"You can perhaps imagine the effect of abject misery, of actual starvation, on such a nature as mine. Conscience grew numb in this instability of my daily life; criminal ideas (whose immorality became doubtful under the assault of a thousand sophistries which sprang up to justify them) thronged my brain. And my distorted, terribly overtaxed imagination, released from all control like a broken engine, whirled me along from one scene of crime to another. It was then I first had the idea of robbery, and I invented all sorts of the most skillful and dexterous affairs, out of which I came without the least taint of suspicion. From robbery to murder is but a step. I took that step and upon a certain day planned the crime which I was to commit three years later.

"I became possessed of the idea that I should murder an old man and his wife—an old couple living together in an isolated hut. I had no particular old couple in mind, nor any particular hut. The people and circumstances were absolutely fictitious—creatures and things of my diseased imagination. But in my mind I saw them clearly. And again and again and yet again did I rehearse the scene. There in the loneliness of my wretched room I enacted the scene of my intended crime in all its detail. For some obscure reason I chose to believe that I would kill the old woman by smothering her with the bolster of the bed. The old man I would slay by striking him upon the temples with a wooden mallet such as coopers use. Why I should imagine this mallet it is impossible to say, but invariably I associated the slaughter of the old man with the idea of a heavy boxwood mallet. After the murder I saw myself turning upon the chest of drawers, that should stand near the bed—an old-fashioned chest of drawers, surmounted with an oval mirror—ransacking them from end to end, rifling them of their contents, and finally discovering the couple's little store of gold hidden in a corner.

"Such was the scene that I, or rather my crazy imagination, constructed, piece by piece, but I may truthfully say that never did I attempt, or think of attempting, to carry out in reality that which was suggested to me in my frenzy.

"Some time later my father, who had disowned me, died, and I came into my fortune. Then I thrust from me with horror all remembrance of the cruel days of my misery. I effaced from my memory the strange delerium into which I had allowed myself to drift. The calm and assurance of my new life, the certitude of the morrow, fortified my conscience, and for a time I was happy.

"On the sixteenth of April, towards the evening, being at that time on horseback in the neighborhood of Versailles, I was surprised by a shower of rain. An isolated hut was near by at the edge of the forest, and I resolved to asked shelter there until the shower was over. I tied my horse to the fence-post and knocked. The door opened. I entered. The hut was of but one apartment. An old man was there, and an old woman—his wife. In one corner was the bed—a long bolster flung across the head in place of pillows. Near by stood an old-fashioned chest of drawers, surmounted with an oval mirror. On the table lay a heavy boxwood mallet such as coopers use. But it was only on the morrow that I could picture the scene clearly to my mind. I was not conscious of what I did at the time. I could only remember it. I said never a word, but walked straight to the boxwood mallet, grasped it, and turned to what I had to do, moving about just as I had done when I rehearsed this scene in my garret. With the precision and inevitableness of a machine, I struck down the old man with the mallet, and with it battered out his brains as he rolled on the floor at my feet. Still moving like a piece of mechanism I stifled the old woman's shrieks beneath the bolster. Machine-like, I rifled the chest of drawers — machine-like, I walked forth from that shambles, mounted my horse, and rode into the city. I came to myself only the next morning."

The gondoliers of Venice seem to be not only a vociferous and picturesque class, but also pretty good men of business. When they threatened to strike recently the municipal authorities hinted at a withdrawal of licences. The gondoliers then lay low, with the result that the Municipal Junta has raised the tariff for gondoliers and set apart a sum for subsidizing those on duty at ferries during winter nights.

"Old Moore's Almanac" made a hit over the Paris fire with this prophecy relating to the last days of April: "We are almost sure to hear news of an awful fire in Paris, which will involve great loss of life, whilst a gang of loafers will be busy amongst the ruins." This is quite near enough to pass for fulfillment.

TO SYMBOLIZE STEVENSON

The "Golden Ship" That is to Stand in the City's Plaza.

In commenting upon the death of Robert Louis Stevenson, the London "Telegraph" made the statement that a sculptor who could conceive of a monument—other than the frock-coated figure of convention—that would adequately interpret or express the author, would have to be as great a man as Stevenson himself.

The attempt has been made, however, by two or three of Les Jeunes of this city, and bids fair to be successful. Surely no more appropriate city could be found than this adventurous, romantic town of San Francisco in which to erect a monument to the author of "The Wreckers," and no more appropriate site could have been selected than the old Plaza—a spot typical of the older, wilder, rougher city of the days before the seventies. Here the monument is to stand. It is to be called the "Stevenson Ship." For by a "ship"—a "thirty-gunner" of the sixteenth century—careening along westward, with golden sails full spread, and with the figure of Pallas, looking toward the setting sun, upon the bow, do the designers of the memorial intend to symbolize Stevenson. The ship is some five feet high; below is a simple granite plinth, upon which is inscribed the famous passage from Stevenson's "Christmas Sermon," beginning > "To be honest, to be kind, to earn a little, to spend a little less, to keep a few friends and these without capitulation."

The simplicity of the monument will probably be its greatest charm. On one surface of the plinth is to be a spigot and cup, and underneath a drip-stone designed especially for thirsty dogs. When Stevenson was here and going to and fro about the city, he often commented upon the Lotta Fountain, lamenting the absence of a drip-stone for the dogs, such as will appear upon his own monument in the Plaza.

The name of the ship will be the "Bonaventure," and the sight of it, sailing always westward, will be, in a manner, a reproach, and, it is just barely possible, an inspiration to some of the stranded and shattered human wrecks that have taken ground upon the Plaza—the jetsam of misfortune.

Bruce Porter and Willis Polk are the designers and promoters of the happy idea, and George Pipers is the sculptor, but, indeed, all the world has aided. Andrew Lang has contributed, and Sir Henry Irving; and Louise Imogen Guinly has been an ever-present help. The expense of the stone plinth has yet to be defrayed, but subscriptions will not be wanting, for wherever his books are read Stevenson is loved and the memory of him cherished. The little monument in San Francisco is but the concrete expression of a wave of sympathy and hearty affection as wide and as vast as the whole Anglo-Saxon race.

The Radical papers in London have been exercised because Mr. Gladstone has not been fitted into the Jubilee procession. Seeing, however, that the G. O. M. is nowadays enjoying the pleasure and comfort of being a "private gentleman," it is not easy to see where there is ground for complaint. So great a man is far beyond the ephemeral distinction to be derived from joining Her Majesty in her passage to and from St. Paul's, which is a simple duty on the part of her leading officials and a mark of respect from her distinguished visitors representing other governments. An ordinary citizen, however eminent, has no place in the ranks.

EXITS AND ENTRANCES

Some Characteristic Gateways of San Francisco.

What the mouth is to the face, so the gate is to the house. By the gate you can tell the character of the house, and by the house you can tell the character of its inmates. For it is not the people who go in at the gate who lend it character, but the people who come out of it. The gate is not meant for the world outside—except that it is meant to shut it out—but primarily for the tiny little world of the house and its people, it opens only for them, and at their sesame, and when it closes upon them, by the mere magic of its click and spring, it isolates them from their fellows. Consider now. I am in the street, on my way home, we will say, and I come to my gate and stand there a moment looking about and up and down the street, for no particular reason. Thus far I am nobody, nothing but a member of a class, a citizen, like a thousand others, like a million others, a mere vertebrate mammal for the matter of that, part and parcel of the vast ocean of human life. I go into my gate and shut it behind me. In an instant I cease to be a type, I become a character. I am a thousand miles and a thousand years away. I am an individual complex, peculiar, particular. Outside is the vague, indeterminate ocean, within is the drop of water, bottled up, and capable of being analyzed, and microscopized, and separated into parts, a thing upon which to ponder, upon which to theorize, upon which to build a whole system of theology. And all this is done by the opening and shutting of a gate.

A mysterious doorway on lower Pine street

A reminiscence of the older aristocracy on Washington street

And if you think there is not character in gates be pleased to observe these half dozen examples taken almost at random from the streets of this city: 1 and 3 are beyond question of the secretive type (suggestive of the closely pursed mouth), gates that do not invite you to enter, as does 2, for instance, and 5. I fancy that 1 is used oftenest at night, and I hope that the people who go into it are muffled or cloaked. An admirable gate is 3; note that it is at the bottom of a flight of stone steps and that grass has grown about the sill, an admirable gate for an elopement or for a rendezvous. Numbers 2 and 4 are the reverse of 1 and 3—gates that are meant to open wide, that call upon you to stop and enter. There is nothing to be hidden behind these gates. The bon bourgeois lives there, the good man, whose books are ever ready to be experted. Number 4 is the gateway built for two. It is a servants' gate I believe, and it is a veritable stage setting for a little comedy of two characters. I wonder how often the butcher, the baker and the kerosene-lamp maker has talked to the housemaids over this gate. But as expressive of character I like this one least of all. The other gates have evidently been adapted to the habits and customs of the people of the house. Number 4 smells of the architect at once.

The gateway according to the New Architecture

Dr. O'Dwyer, the Bishop of Limerick, gave some plain Sunday talk to a congregation at Askeaton recently. He told the people that they were "idiots or worse" to conceal the names of a clique of individuals who disgraced the diocese by murder and violence—men, he added, who in free countries like France or America wou d be "shot down like dogs." For his part, if he could get their names, they would be publicly excommunicated. He counseled the people to pay their rents and not to trouble themselves about "keeping up a number of professing patriots, who are knocking money out of the people." The warning might be extended to some of the simple-minded Irish folk in America, who are stinting themselves for the benefit of the same class.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

It is slack water time over at the State University just now, professors and students alike are scattered to the four winds enjoying their vacations, the buildings are closed and the campus is neglected and overgrown with weeds. However, there is a note of preparation here and there. The question of water supply for the irrigation of the grounds (that bete noir of faculty and students alike) is to be answered by the erection of a reservoir somewhere along the course of Strawberry Creek. This should go far to relieve the brown dryness of the campus during the summer, and will be hailed with delight by all the "old grads" of the college. The U. C., as it is, is often rather bare looking. A judicious use of water would easily make a different place of it. Apropos of the campus, it is understood that the athletic authorities of the State University contemplate some rather radical changes and reforms in the conduct of the coming football season. Berkeley was rather shaken up over the "farce of '96," as the last football game was called, and does not intend that it should be repeated. For one thing, the U. C. has probably seen the last of Eastern coaches. Mr. Mott of Brown University and Al. Lean, the whilom trainer of the Reliance Club, will take the eleven in hand in September. Mott is a resident assistant instructor at the college, and was chosen by Captain Whitney for his All-America Eleven. Al. Lean has been engaged to handle the U. C. athletes for the next two years. As an earnest of what may be expected of this combination, it is only necessary to refer to the year just past. The University of California has been victorious in every intercollegiate event during the season, winning the baseball tournament handily from Stanford for the first time in the history of the two colleges. It is to be hoped that Mr. Mott and Mr. Lean will be equally successful with the California Eleven. It is said that the practice and training for the Thanksgiving game with Stanford will be lighter and easier tran ever before. This is a highly commendable policy, as the U. C. has never put an eleven upon the gridiron against Stanford that was not lamentably overtrained.

The selection of Jack Bonnet as License Collector forms an extraordinary precedent. He is a real newspaperman, is actively engaged in reporting, and though he has worked hard and often for the success of friends in and out of office, is actually accorded political recognition. Time and again have I known public men declare their success and prominence directly due to the efforts of certain journalists, whom they have affected to esteem but for whom they have done little. Gratitude has been expressed verbally and has been exhausted in words. In this instance, however, a newspaperman has obtained a valuable office, and all his colleagues rejoice. Some twenty-two deputyships are his to divide, and the salary is well worth collecting. In addition to his success in journalism, Bonnet is the champion handball player of the coast and has been president of the Press Club. He has "done" the City Hall for the "Report" these many years and has a very large acquaintance—a most valuable advantage in his profession—and he has both good sense and judgment. He used to be the best baseball reporter in town. Over the appointment there was quite a contest. A combination had been made on behalf of Fred Lees with Rainey at Sacramento, and the portly boss had promised to assist in retaining the son of the Chief in office. It was assumed that this could be done by enlisting the Mayor and the Auditor on behalf of different candidates. A lengthy petition was filed with Mr. Broderick on behalf of a certain Mint employe named Jack Fenton, one of Rainey's most obsequious followers. At the same time half a dozen men were begging the aid of Phelan. However, Bonnet has the favor of the Auditor and he obtained the backing of the Mayor, who believes in recognizing journalism. He succeeded in conciliating certain votes in the Board, and on the eventful night there was a majority for confirming him, quite upsetting the calculations of Lees, who imagined Rainey could create a deadlock and that he would hold over for another term. He has already held the office four years. The consequences, it is said, will be disagreeable for the Boss, as the failure of Lees' plan is attributed to treachery and there is a great deal of feeling involved. The Chief is not the most comfortable man to have as an enemy.

I ran across a paragraph in the daily papers a few days ago which stated that an amended complaint had been filed in the Alameda Superior Court in the suit instituted against Josiah P. Ames by his aged sister. The document alleged fraud and deception with all of the ugly and formidable language of the law, and was leveled at the integrity of an old and honored man. Mr. Ames is somewhere in the middle sixties, and his sister, reported to be a kindly old lady, has rounded out full seventy years of age. For years the brother had the management and control of her property, which he carried out with rare skill and financial sagacity. In the natural order of things the money so intrusted to him would have increased none, and its owner, unfamiliar with business methods, would have been fortunate had it produced a fair rate of interest alone. During the term of his management the amount grew to much larger proportions. Finally a rupture came, through some intermeddler, I am told, and the result has been a crop of unsavory law suits. Ordinarily litigation does not appeal to the sentimental side of my nature, but there is something pathetic in this situation. Life at best cannot continue for any protracted period with either of the litigants. From prattling infancy they had been trustful, tender and loving with each other. For years he had been her adviser, and just at the hour when the sun of their lives cast long shadows behind, and death and eternity seems but a step beyond, it seems inexplicable that the weaker of the two could be induced to publicly blacken the reputation of the other and in the closing days of his career embitter his life and throw suspicion about him that he may never live to explain. Even if Ames were guilty, which is highly improbable, it would seem to be human nature, under all the circumstances, for the sister to conceal his delinquency rather than expose it. But humanity is "mighty uncertain" after all. While my sympathies go out to the assailed, I must confess to some sympathy for the aged lady who has been led to such a course. Such litigation should not be permitted to hang fire in the courts, for even if completely victorious, the brother will never live to wipe out the suspicion that will stick in spite of innocence established under ample proof.

In the best sense of that much abused term, the late George Barnes was a gentleman. Among the journalists of the city he stood out a notable and distinguished figure—notable for his splendid physique, fine manner and rich, admirably modulated voice. He was decidedly a personality, was George Barnes, reserved, dignified, courteous, with whom fate had dealt less kindly than his deserts. He was mainly identified with journalism through the "Morning Call," of which he was one of the founders and the first managing editor. Selling out his interest to Pickering and Fitch, he went to his home in the South, and returned to California to assume the role of dramatic critic for that paper. He was an excellent critic, urbane and kindly in statement but accurate and unflinching in his judgments. Of acting he was really a judge; his verdicts were no guess work or vague impressions, for he had a ripe experience to guide him and a liberal and responsive mind to keep him alive to the progress of the drama. He had prejudices, of course, but they were well founded, and I know of no writer whose opinions and whose individuality had mong actors greater weight. George Barnes lived aloof from the noisy world in a suite of rooms at the Commercial Hotel, which he had occupied for over a decade. There he attended to his literary labors, which were quite extensive; he wrote sketches, prepared the news of the month for the Australian newspapers, whose representative he was here. Readers of the "Bulletin' will remember the sketches of early day celebrities he contributed to its columns. They represented a vein of his peculiar knowledge, and though hardly equal in style to certain of his earlier writings in the "Call," were of vital interest and importance to Californians. He had a very easy, fluent style at all times, but in none of his literary experience did he convey the distinction of his individuality. He was a man whom the writer will always remember as a gentleman, kindly, honorable, manly and true.

To let a man out on his O. K. is, in the language of the Police Court hangers-on, to release him on his own recognizance. The custom as understood by some of the Judges of these courts is capable of variations which would not sound well in the columns of the daily press nor redound to the credit of the gentlemen who indulge in them. It is the "push" that has the "pull," and that it knows how and where it may best be applied is illustrated by the subjoined dialogue overheard in a certain hall of justice of this city. One of the parties, a gentleman of Irish extraction—rather imperfectly extracted—was overheard to remark to a county officer: "Devil a bit could I move him." "Is that so?" answered the deputy. "Why was that?" "I dunno," said the other; "but faith, we'll pull the Judge's leg so hard that he'll be pushed out on his own O. K. to-morrow."

What a pity it is that the real interests of our State don't somethimes engage the solicitude of our Congressmen. It is possible to work up an agitation against the Southern Pacific Company and command the zeal of all our representatives, but if it is the obtaining of an appropriation or pushing through a public work for the coast, they are lax and, apparently impotent. Years ago the Government purchased a building site on Mission street for a postoffice. Congress subsequently appropriated over a million for preparatory work. Plans were prepared for an extensive and costly building, on which it was proposed to expend four millions of dollars. At the same time there were to be erected Federal buildings at Portland and in Arizona, and Supervising Architect Aitken announced that these structures would be constructed of stone quarried in the environment. This announcement did not at all suit the ideas of Senator Proctor of Vermont, who, with Senator Platt of New York and certain other eminent Senators, have large interests in the marble and granite trust that controls the operations of the Eastern quarries. So they demanded the dismissal of Mr. Aitken, and it said now that new plans are to be prepared. This means not only a delay of years, but also that the stone will be cut and dressed in the Eastern quarries of Senator Proctor and shipped here round the Horn. This an excellent prospect for Californians, who will have the privilege only of setting the rocks in place. However, as long as the basis of our Congressional representation is hatred of the Southern Pacific Company our city will have the worst of it. Think what an assistance during the period of depression the expenditure of a few million of Government money would have been. The fact is, combination is the basis of strength in Washington as elsewhere in legislative bodies, and our people will never have any strength until they join forces and consider the interests of their communities above the claims of party politics.

The mists and cool winds which followed the hot spell in the San Joaquin Valley have done wonders for the wheat. Instead of a poor crop, as was anticipated, there is every prospect of last season's returns being exceeded. Indeed, I am told that new orders for bags have been sent in, and that the reaper and harvester men are happy over the prospective activity of business. The fruit crop is also better than the original forecast, and altogether California will have a bountiful year. The effect of this prospect is apparent in country banks, where there is a revival of confidence, and money is much easier in consequence.

BOSWELL JR.

Mr. Jeremiah Curtin, the translator of "Quo Vidas" into English, is one of the foremost of American philologists. He began his work of translation in Mexico, where the story in its serial form reached him, very often in the most out of the way places. He commenced it in Guadalajara, continued it on his travels, and finally finished it in Guatemala, in Guatemala City, and in country and mountainous districts, where no white man had ever been. In his translation he was given much assistance by his wife, who did all the mechanical work. Mr. Curtin is a Wisconsin man, a graduate of Harvard, and was for five years atached to the American Legation at St. Petersburg. It was there he acquired an extensive knowledge of the Slavonic tongues, for which he has become distinguished, and which enabled him to translate not only "Quo Vidas" but also three other novels of Sienkiewicz—"With Fire and Sword," "The Deluge" and "Pan Michard"—a most dramatic trilogy.

WHERE COAL IS KING

The Town of Carbonado and Its Inexhaustible Beds.

It would appear that while the citizens of San Francisco are paying the most extravagant prices for their supply of fuel, there are practically inexhaustible beds of excellent coal almost at their very doors. The State of Washington can produce quite as large a quantity of coal as any State in the Union, and a protective tariff is supposed to offer every eccouragement to the home mines. But it is the kind of protective tariff that does not protect. A substantial tax is levied on coal with the intention of stimulating mine-owners to develop their property. There is no doubt that this would prove effective if there were other tariffs, but the American ship must also be protected.

The domestic shipper is handicapped far more than the amount of the tariff on foreign coal by his inability to obtain an American steam collier. Any foreign tramp that comes to our port can be secured by the British mine-owner to bring his coal to market at a price far below anything the American ships can offer. Last year 1,500,000 tons of coal were consumed in the San Francisco market. Washington contributed but 380,000 tons of this amount, British Columbia and Australia furnishing the greater portion.

The Washington mines can and do produce annually 1,250,000 tons. Last year this product was sold at the mines at an average price of $2.16 to the short ton, and if proper colliers could be obtained it could be landed in this city at $3.66 per ton. Coal at this price would enable our manufacturers to compete on equal terms with manufacturers in the East, while in the matter of domestic consumption nearly $2000 per day could be saved.

Much of the coal of the State of Washington comes from the mines at Carbon Hill. These mines are situated on the Cascade Division of the Northern Pacific Railroad, about thirty miles from Tacoma, and are among the most interesting and picturesque in the country. They are located upon the banks of the Carbon River, which in itself is a most remarkable little stream. It is a pure glacial river, ice-cold and rapid, and in course of time has cut a deep canyon in the stratified formation of the mountains through which it flows. In summer it is of a most peculiar color—milk white—from the impalpable granite dust which permeates its waters. This dust is due to the tremendous grinding of the glaciers upon its rock channel, reducing the rocks to a powder as fine as flour. In winter, however, when the glaciers freeze tight, the dust vanishes as if by magic, and the river becomes as clear as crystal.

The whole flank of the mountain upon which the mines are located is tunneled like a honeycomb. Some of these tunnels are much over a mile in length, and in order to facilitate a quick extraction, the management of the mines have actually put on tiny locomotives to draw the ore cars from the breast of the vein to the surface. Recently, however, one of these trains, in emerging from the tunnel, was caught in a landslide and carried down into the river. A huge dam was formed at once and the course of the river checked, until, at length, the pressure of the water burst its bounds and carried away the debris in a huge freshet. So great was the amount of earth collected in the river and so powerful was the force of the current that the entire train and locomotive were not so much as seen again.

It is because of the danger of these landslides that the town of Carbonado, a picturesque village of very considerable size has been located upon the bluffs overhanging the canyon instead of at the bottom of the ravine. On more than one occasion a falling rock has become loosened from the slope above, and, crashing down the mountain side, has made a hole in a building in its path as clean and sharply cut as though the result of a cannonade.

There is no denying the enterprise of the English. Accompanying the recent military expedition sent into the Ashantee country in Africa to punish the king for certain massacres was a clever young mining engineer, who calculated that he might find extensive gold fields there. This assumption was based on the variety of gold ornaments worn by the natives and to the fact that the savage monarch possessed a service of gold drinking cups and other utensils which he brought out on great occasions. The supposition proved accurate, for the engineer found a formation of country that promises to be one of the great gold fields of the earth, transcending the rich Transvaal region. He located a claim and organized a syndicate to take hold. A ten-stamp mill was set up at once, and the result is eight hundred ounces of gold per month, though this is but a commencement. The company has purchased from the natives one hundred square miles of territory, embracing the best mineral land, which should give them a species of monopoly. The young engineer who made the find is now in San Francisco looking into certain California properties on behalf of his syndicate. He is to go to the Kootenai district and then back to Ashantee to take charge of the developments there.

Paper can now be hung by machinery. The device has a rod on which a roll of paper is placed, and a paste reservoir with a feeder placed, so as to engage the wrong side of the paper. The end of the paper is fastened to the bottom of the wall, and the machine started up the wall, being held in place by the operator. A roller follows the paper as it unwinds and presses it against the wall. When the top of the wall is reached, the operator pulls a string, which cuts the paper off from the roll.

The Paris cab-drver Georges, who distinguished himself in rescue work at the fire, has been enrolled a Knight of the Legion of Honor. It is stated that the worst burns received by himself and others who assisted on the occasion were received from the flaming flesh of the women whom they bore out of the blaze.

IF HAWAII WERE OURS

Some Things to be Gained by the Annexation of the Islands.

The annexation of the Hawaiian Islands by the American Government, should such an event come to pass, will be, so it would appear, rather a matter of form than of actual reality. For the "Islands" have long since been practically Americanized. The American is the dominant spirit in Honolulu. It is he who does the governing, the thinking, the buying,, the selling and the trading. It is he who founds the industries, erects the buildings, prints the papers and opens up the plantations. The native, good-natured and non-progressive, counts but for little on these his own islands, while the British and German elements, the only foreign elements that are not American, are too small to make themselves felt or heard.

So it is that any change in the administration of the Hawaiian Is'ands effects chiefly the Americans. American opinions, aims and institutions are those that shape the policy of the country, and it is these that must be consulted first when any very radical change is contemplated. So strong is this American element in the "Islands" that it has forced its way into and now practically controls the Government. The Executive is American, the Ministers are American, the heads of half the departments are natives of the United States and strong majorities in the Advisory Council and Legislature, as well as in the Supreme Court, are Americans. Navigators from this country were almost the first white people to set foot upon the "Islands." These pioneers have built up the country, and it is now their descendants or successors who are in practical possession. They have made the country an American colony, and now are only waiting for the formal sanction of the Home Government to become a part and parcel of the United States.

There can be no doubt as to the advisability of the annexation of the "Islands" from a financial point of view. The conditions of soil and climate have made of Hawaii a veritable hot house on a gigantic scale, to such an extent, in fact, that sufficient coffee, sugar and kindred products of tropical localities can be cultivated to supply every city and town throughout the entire western coast of America. Of course the United States would be obliged to assume the Hawaiian debt, but the Island Government is so far from being bankrupt that after all obligations had been met there would yet remain to the credit of our country something over four millions of dollars.

Besides this, even the most conservative are at one mind on the subejct of an increase of values as a result of annexation. Not only would all kinds of property be advanced in price, but in the course of one presidential administration would even double in value. The revenue accruing from the taxes alone, over and above all expense, would amount to $1,000,000 yearly, while in the words of Mr. P. C. Jones, the sometime Minister of Finance, "The income from customs duties alone, for twenty years, taken on an average, would pay the entire interest on the public debt, together with the debt itself, and leave a balance in the treasury of $731,700."

The American whale ships were the commercial pioneers in the "Islands" as far back as 1819, a few years after their discovery, and for a long time this industry continued, and, with the trade in sandalwood and copra, was the chief business of the place. But twenty years later the planter had come, and come to stay; a white resident population had grown up, and coffee and sugar began to be cultivated. With the growth of the sugar industry began Hawaii's great prosperity, all kinds of collateral business flourished, substantial warehouses, office buildings and residences were built, and when, three years later, the "Islands" were recognized among the other nations of the world and a formal treaty had brought all danger of political disturbances to an end, Hawaii could be said to have fairly entered upon the best period of her prosperity.

N THE BUSINESS QUARTER

NUUANU AVENUE

If the present negotiations relative to annexation are successful, the United States may become proud in the possession of a group of islands as fair and as beautiful as any the world round. Set in a tropical sea, the climate deliciously warm, productive to a marvelous degree, and peopled by gentle, sober and industrious natives, the "Islands" are no doubt all that is claimed for them—a prize to be coveted by any of the nations of the earth.

"MADE IN FRANCE"

The Latest Gossip from the Gay French Capital.

Le Tout Paris is just now agitated over the proposed "New Academy," whose existence has been for a long time threatened by the persistent lawsuits on the part of the Goncourt heirs. It seems that the famous brothers left some seventy thousand dollars in cash and some two hundred and fifty thousand in property to be devoted to the founding of a new French academy, thoroughly hostile and antagonistic in its theories to the old band of Immortals of the Institute. The Goncourts named a certain number of contemporaneous French authors as charter members of the society, with the provision that these charter members should elect ten more. Alphonse Daudet is at the head of the enterprise, and will no doubt be its first President, now that its inception is assured. For some time, however, the heirs of the estate have been trying to break the will, which of course puts almost the whole estate out of their hands. A final judgment has been awarded in favor of Daudet and his friends, and the "New Academy" will no doubt soon become a feature of literary Paris. If by any means the heirs of the Goncourts should break the will, Daudet and his associates will undertake the founding of the academy on their own responsibility, though naturally it will not be upon such an ambitious scale as the Goncouts intended.

HUMBERT, KING OF ITALY

Whom Princess Helene has involved in a family scandal

By the way, Daudet is to publish—in fact, has published—his latest book. This is the one topic of conversation amongst the literary gossips of Paris. The book is perhaps disappointing to the readers of "Jack." In fact, it is not a novel at all. It might be called a collection of short stories, but it is hardly even that. Daudet himself calls them "pages de la vie," which indeed are simple little sketches of real life with but little fictitious composition and without much sequence. However, "amateurs de la prose" will be delighted with the exquisite choice of words and the inimitable pen pictures, examples of which can be found in almost every paragraph. There is a sad and minor note that often recurs in these little sketches that is very characteristic of Daudet. A delightful exception is "La Fete des Toits," in which there figure as chief actors sparrows, gnomes, kobolds and the "petit Jesus" of the French Christmas.

What with the persistent train of disasters, sudden deaths and attempted assassinations the nerves of Paris are kept on the rack. Last week another kinematograph caught fire, and the boulevardiers, with the Charity Bazaar horror still in mind (and perhaps a little heedful of the charge of cowardice laid upon them), fairly stampeded the place in their mad efforts to extinguish the blaze. The damage done by the fire amounted to but two hundred francs. The wreckage caused by the efforts of the volunteer fire brigade in their misguided efforts was repaired at an expense of two thousand.

FELIX FAURE, PRESIDENT CF FRENCH

Whose "suppression" was attempted this week

And in this connection it will be fitting to speak of the prompt and well meaning generosity of the Countess de Castellane (nee Anna Gould), who has offered two hundred thousand dollars in cash for the rebuilding of the Charity Bazaar. The only condition attached to the gift is that the building must be fireproof.

And now again Helene of Orleans, once called the most beautiful Princess of Europe, has brought herself before the world in her effort to escape from it. On a previous occasion Helene tried to stab herself in the presence of her husband, whom she detests, and did actually cut her wrist to such an extent that she was in a fair way to bleed to death. Two or three weeks ago, in the afternoon, the Princess was suddenly missed about her palace, and was sought for in vain until her servants remembered that she had last been seen on the way to the bath. The door of the bathroom was forced, and the unhappy woman was found face downward in the tub, which was half full of water. She was unconscious at the time, and at first her resident physician despaired of her life. After three hours' work she revived only to become hysterical and frantic, declaring her loathing and hatred for her husband and reiterating her decision never to return to him again. Helene's has been a life of many romances. All the world knows of her love for the present Czar, and how the match—though Nicholas himself was in love with the beautiful Bourbon—was broken off for state reasons. Similar reasons were the motive for her present alliance with King Humbert's nephew, the Duke of Aosta. So violent is Helene's dislike for her husband that she at one time fled from his palace and took refuge in the residence of a French noblewoman of her acquaintance. Here she was followed by the King and his ministers, who bullied her into submission and almost by force returned her to her husband. It was on this occasion that she attempted to stab herself.

The people of Italy are passionately devoted to Helene, and at each fresh dash for liberty (even though at the price of her life) on her part only serves to augment the bitterness which is fermenting in the hearts of the Italians against their King. From the time of Marie Antoinette women have largely figured in revolutions, and it would not be surprising some day if the Princess d'Orleans, Duchess d'Aosta, etc., should become the pivot about which would revolve the red whirl of popular insurrection.

Mr. Tyson, the Australian multi-millionaire, made his first big haul shortly after the great rush to the Bendigo goldfield. Thousands of gold seekers were encamped on the golden flat, and a meat famine was at its height, when Tyson shrewdly arrived on the scene with a herd of cattle and a numerous flock of sheep. He made a profit of something like 10,000 per cent. on that little speculation, and he went on investing in sheep-farming, railway contracting, acquiring land in the vicinity of rising towns, etc., until now his accumulated wealth is variously estimated at from five to seven millions.

Frederic Harrison and Cyril Maude, at the Haymarket Theater, announce that the dramatization of "Under the Red Robe," made by Edward Rose, an American, has yielded a profit of $110,000. With "Secret Service," the reigning success in London, it seems almost as if the old order has been reversed and London is looking to New York instead of New York to London.

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

We are told, Diary dear, in volumes of natural history that in the winter time "bears and kindred beasts hibernate in secluded places"—and, from personal observation, I am inclined to think that men employ their time similarly in the summer. Last week mamma and Aunt Sybil made a tour of the various springs in order to see how all the world disported itself in these June days. But, my dear, they might have been in a land of Amazons, for, with the exception of the stage driver, an occasional and a stray clergyman on his summer vacation, nothing of the genus male appeared on the horizon. But women, hordes of them—bright-eyed little girls, would-be flirtatious maidens and calm ox-eyed matrons. Aunt Sybil said she learnt more of the behavior of servants, the upbringing of small children and the woes with dressmakers than she deemed possible outside of a Woman's Congress. Then, too—but do not breathe it in Gath—the moral question was discussed in all its bearings. What do they do at the springs? Eat, sleep and gossip. An occasional adventurous spirit takes a walk; a "blue" reads a novel—a Duchess novel. Few "Patience Sparhawks" are seen at the springs. Mrs. Atherton is too exciting in these warm summer days.

I have been stopping at the San Rafael off and on for the past week, but I try to come home and see that papa and Arthur are comfortable. Papa will not leave the city before July. You know he is far too busy—and we must have the bawbees. On Friday evening Bertha and Ethel Smith arranged a moonlight cycle ride at San Rafael and invited we-us, etc. We had a capital time. The roads there are rather good and the country for riding is exceedingly pretty. I hear a great deal of paper chases in the near future. All or nearly all of the equestrians have been perfecting themselves during the winter months by taking courses in horsemanship at the Pacific Avenue School, you know, so cross-country riding will no longer be considered a feat to be avoided, unless one carry a heavy life insurance. Then there is considerable excitement over the Fourth of July tennis tournament which is to be the Event, with a capital E, of the season, and superior to any former tilt for supremacy.

On Saturday evening I stayed with the Boyds, and a party of us went to a dance at the Pinkerts' place in Ross Valley. All the Eyre-Atherton-Macondray crowd, together with the elite of San Rafael, were there in full feather and we had a blissful time—even though it was hot for dancing. The gowning was simple—organdies, light grenadines, etc., but it was a very jolly party.

On Sunday we wheeled up to Fairfax Villa for luncheon. That is the "correct caper," as Arthur would say, and one gets a capital lunch nicely served. Leila went to the Burlingame picnic on Sunday which she enjoyed vastly. All the Tobin-Jarboe contingent were en evidence. On Tuesday quite a crowd of us went to bid Juliet Williams a fond farewell when she started on her Eastern trip. Her section was simply piled with flowers, books, and innumerable boxes of candy. I trust she won't turn into a sweet before she arrives, though in these warm days a grease spot is nearer the mar... I hear that the Owens have taken the William B. Hooper house at the corner of Jones and Sacramento streets, so I hope they will renew their practice of giving those jolly little dinners which we all enjoyed so vastly. Allie Owen has a special gift in the arrangement of a dinner and knows just how many to invite and who wishes to sit beside whom, and what more can the most exacting demand. And now farewell for a little while, Diary dear, even an indefatigable debutante with the disposition of a cricket must need a silly season in which to collect her waning faculties. Lovingly your own

MISS CRICKET.

The wedding of the week was that of Miss Mabel Estee, the charming daughter of Mr. and Mrs. M. M. Estee, and Mr. Leonard Everett. It was celebrated amid an abundance of flowers and foliage, and after the ceremony the usual reception followed. Mrs. Everett made a very interesting and happy bride, and looked quite her prettiest in the snowy silk of her wedding garments.

At the Hotel Rafael there are now one hundred and thirty-five guests, with additions every week. Indeed, the caravansary is better filled than it has been at any time in years past, and with a sort of people who are being made very comfortable and who will probably remain throughout the season. Married folk are in the ascendant, though there is quite a goodly crowd of bachelors and maids. The feminine element have the hotel to themselves all day, so the daily excitement begins with the arrival of the 5 o'clock train from town. There have been a few riding and driving parties during the week, though the weather has hardly been as inviting as it might. The nine-pin alley is the gathering place at night, and one sees some competent bowling, Mr. Crooks and Miss Kip being the accredited champions.

The list of events is rather brief thus far. On Friday last the Misses Smith had a bicycle meet. On Saturday there was a dance at the Pinkerts', at Ross Valley. On Sunday there were numerous luncheon parties at Pastori's. On the previous Thursday night Mr. Pardee gave a dinner in the private dining room, in honor of his fiancee, Miss Adams of Philadelphia. These are but the forerunners of other entertainments to be given later on during the season. In the early future the paper chases will begin, and the San Rafael Hunt Club is making arrangements to have its first hunt a week from today. The course has been selected by an expert huntsman, and he has guaranteed that there will be no danger whatever in following the scent. This will dispose of the impression that hunting is an anxious pastime. Whoever wants jumping can have it, but care will be taken that no one need do any leaping unless specially ambitious. Among the arrivals for the week are Mrs. Hager, Miss Hager and Miss Alice Hager, Mr. and Mrs. Rosenstock, Mr. and Mrs. I. N. Walter, Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Mills and Miss Mills.

Madame Barrios has not yet emerged from her quarters at the Rafael. She is taking the rest cure, but her term is nearly over, and the probabilities are that she will soon participate in the current gaieties. The young Poheims have contributed cleverly to the entertainment of the guests recently, rendering selections on the violin and piano. They have considerable musical talent.

Though not unexpected, the death of Mr. Hiram Tubbs has cast quite a shadow over Oakland. Mr. Tubbs was one of the oldest residents and was held in universal esteem, not alone by his cotemporaries, but by all the younger generation that were accustomed to consult him on their business ventures. Though a shrewd man, he was generous, open-hearted, and took a paternal interest in the affairs of his city. His three daughters are among the most popular of the Oakland society women. They are Mrs. Judge Henshaw, Mrs Will Henshaw and Mrs. Hall.

At last the summer exodus has commenced in earnest, and Oakland is almost deserted. The Pringle family and Mr. Rausam have gone to Little Geyser Springs, and thence are to visit the various springs in Lake county. Mrs. C. E. Steele and her daughters, accompanied by Miss Elsie Bennet, are at the Steele Ranch, near Auburn. The A. A. Moores are at their ranch near Mission San Jose, and Mr. A. S. Macdonald, Andrew L. Stone and E. F. Adam are at Laurel Dell lake.

Miss Minnie Bailey, who has been traveling in Europe for the past year or so, has just returned. Miss Maud Howard and Mr. Frank Howard are expected home about the end of June.

An exceedingly pretty home wedding was that of Miss Belle Van Arminge, of East Oakland, and Mr. James Monroe Gamble, of San Francisco. The ceremony took place in the drawing-room, which was hung in garlands of pink blossoms. These were suspended from the center of the ceiling, where they were tied with an immense bow of pink satin. The bride, who is a pretty girl, wore a soft white organdie over white taffeta. There were no bridesmaids. Miss Aimee Reid was maid of honor, and wore white organdie over pink silk.

There seems to be no end to the entertainments given to Miss Jessie Coleman and Mr. Harry Knowles, and rarely has an engaged couple received such an ovation. Mrs. J. A. Folger gave a dinner in their honor last week which was an immensely smart affair. The table decorations were in red carnations. Among those invited were Mr. and Mrs. H. M. A. Miller, Miss Ella Goodall, Miss Donaldson and Mr. Sam McKee. Judge and Mrs. Garber also entertained Miss Coleman and Mr. Knowles at dinner in Berkeley last week. The menu was capital, the dinner particularly jolly, as all the Garber entertainments are. Miss Doff, Miss Donaldson, Mr. Bakewell and Mr. McKee were among those invited.

In interesting affair was the "conundrum" luncheon given by Mrs. Seaton at her home in Highland Park, last week, in honor of Mrs. Thompson. Prizes were given to those who solved the greatest number of riddles, and several original ones were propounded. The table was massed in pale blue corn flowers.

Another smart luncheon was given by Mrs. John J. Valentine at her home in Cedar Croft. It was in honor of her sister-in-law, Miss Valentine, who is at present visiting her. The table decorations were roses. Quite a large affair was the luncheon given by Mrs. Babcock at the home of her mother, Mrs. D. Henshaw Ward. There were about twenty guests who were seated at small tables all decorated in green and white.

The entertainments to the various whist clubs continue. A jolly dinner was given by Mr. and Mrs. Fred Hall to the members of their whist club last week. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. Sam Buck, Mr. and Mrs. Taft, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Hoyton, Mrs. Brookes and Mrs. Pennoyer.

Oakland has again been attacked by the bicycle fever, and every night informal parties are arranged, and from ten to twenty young people sally forth in the direction of Haywards or Berkeley, or over to Alameda. These affairs are usually arranged by telephone, and the participants either take supper at the Hayward's Club House or have Welsh rarebit and beer on their return home.

The Maison Riche serves an elegant dinner at popular prices.

Quite the most interesting collection of photographs to be found here is that of the Taber Photograph Gallery, 121 Post street. Here is a splendid collection of Pacific Coast views, views of the old Missions, of the great orchards of California, of the Yosemite, Kings River Canyon, and all the other great scenic points. They are excellent views and clever compositions in the pictorial sense. Indeed, Taber's is the only place in town where one can obtain good views of San Francisco and its environment. Among the collection are splendid photos of Alaskan scenery and a most interesting assemblage of Honolulan views from which the photographs published in the current number are made. It is interesting to note that Mr. Ross, Taber's new operator, is spoken of by experts as the cleverest operator in the country.

Style counts more positively in a hat than in a gown. To obtain a chic hat intelligent women go to E. E. Caswell's, 28 Post street. It is interesting to note that all the hats and bonnets in this stock have been reduced to half price.

LAWN TENNIS

Again Threatning to Develope Into an Excitement.

For the first time in years tennis begins to be an excitement. The annual tournament is at hand, and the cranks have begun to assemble at early morning and at dewy eve in the various courts. Their talk runs on about champions past and present, and is much concerned with the outcome of the match on July 4th at San Rafael. It seemed probable, earlier in the season, that certain of the prominent Eastern players would be persuaded to come West. General Warfield, who has manifested considerable interest in tennis, made an effort to realize this anticipation, but the time was not propitious. The prospect, however, has proved a spur to the local cracks to keep in form during the winter, and in consequence the fight for the "singles" championship this year will be far harder than usual. Every day for the past week or two the courts of the California Lawn Tennis Club have been active. Out at the Oakland grounds there has been an equal movement. I learn that the Hardys are already in their finest form. Messrs. Stone and Nicholson, who played such good tennis at the San Mateo tournament, Selby, Gage, Pratt and Spencer, are doing excellent work and will be heard of in the finals. Alameda will be well represented by Holmes and Bowen. The latter has been practicing recently at the California Club.

Those who are interested in forecasting the championship probabilities will be glad to learn that George De Long proposes to participate during the week of the Fourth. He has put in several afternoons at the California courts recently, and shows he has lost little of his old dexterity, though it is two years since he has done any work. However, the local men are not to have it all their own way. Mr. Dillingham, who is the champion of Hawaii, is on his way up from the Islands to participate. It is said he is a strong man. If his form may be gauged by that of one of his clubmates, Mr. Wilder, who has done considerable practice on the grounds recently, he will prove a hard man to beat.

On Sunday last there was quite a gathering at the courts to see the match between R. N. Whitney and George Bradshaw, who crossed racquets with H. N. Stetson and Professor Joe Daly. The result was a victory for the visiting team, the score being 6-2, 6-4. Tomorrow a party of tennis experts are expected at the hotel to participate in practice games. I learn also that there has been formed a Hotel Rafael Club, for which the services of Professor Daly have been secured. Mr. Crooks is one of the prime movers in the tennis cause, and is interested in developing new players. There are some excellent budding possibilities in sight which ought to add to the interest of the coming events. The indications are all for a very successful tournament, and the experts claim that the cup will surely change hands.

A Splendid Showing.

Since assuming the agency at the beginning of the year, of Moet & Chandon White Seal (Grande Cuvee), Messrs. William Wolff & Co. have imported twenty-six hundred cases—in view of the dull season, a remarkable sum—of which the agents, as well as the shippers, may well be proud. Californians also know a good thing when they can get it.—Pacific Wine and Spirit Review.

DRAMATIC NOTES

Singers of the Guilbert sort, of the style of Pacquerette and Anna Held, are practically an unknown quantity in San Francisco. The nearest we have had to the type, at the Orpheum, at least, is Josephine Sabel. Sabel is very bright, her gown is very pretty with its pink bodice and its pink roses, and her powdered back is a dream. She sings a French song very well; in truth, right cleverly, even though she lacks the finish a chanteuse should have. Her second number, a pretty American thing, is a little forced, but we could love her if she stopped at that. Unfortunately she goes on with a rough negro ditty with some rough business brought in which takes away the effect of her pretty ways and her pretty gown. The negro work takes well, better than the chasonette or the pretty American melody, but it takes with the gallery—that thing of whistles and vulgarity, and in her darkey song Sabel sings to the gallery.

The prettiest scene in the romantic drama, "In the Heart of the Storm," at Morosco's this week, is the ruined distillery in the third act; it is well put together and makes a pleasing picture. It is unusual to see Lander Stevens as a villain, but as Romeo Estado, a Cuban smugglar, he is picturesque and effective ,and with John J. Pierson, his partner in evil, gives the very best work in the performance.

"The Prisoner of Zenda," with its interesting romance and dramatic situations, will be given at the Baldwin Theater Monday evening by Daniel Frohman's Lyceum Company, with James K. Hackett as Rudolph, Charles Walcott as Colonel Sapt and May Mannering, the new leading lady of the compay, as the lonely Princess Flavia. The remainder of the cast includes Elizabeth Tyree William Courtleigh, Frank P. Mills, George W. Middleton. For the second week "The First Gentleman of Europe," Mrs. Burnett's new play, will be given, and for the third Louis N. Parker's "The Mayflower"; for the fourth and last "The Late Mr. Costello."

The play at Morosco's next week, "The Man From the South," will be noticeable for its dramatic interest rather than any special mechanical effects, although one scene, that of the Dakota Club, a gambling hell, will be very much out of the ordinary. Maud Edna Hall appears as Madeline Ashley, which she created in the East two years ago. The balance of the cast will be given to the regular company, including Miss Virginia Jackson, a talented young actress, who will make her first appearance as Florence Stanley.

An interesting revival of a famous old play will be given at the Alcazar Monday evening in the production of Douglas Jerrold's "Black Eyed Susan." The scenery has been specially prepared and the cast, which is a long one, includes George Osborne as William; Charles Bryant, Captain Crosstree; F. B. Clayton, Hatchet; Adele Belgarde, Susan, and Juliet Crosby, Dolly. The "First Born" will enter on its seventh week, the fiftieth performance occurring Monday evening, when souvenir medallions will be distributed in honor of the event.

Lew Dockstadter, the greatest minstrel of them all, will open at the Orpheum Monday evening with some very new specialties. Caron and Herbert, comedy acrobats, are among the new people; also Alexander Heindel, the great cello virtuoso; and Canfield and Carleton, comic opera and burlesque artists. Josephine Sabel heads the balance of the bill, which includes Conway and Leland, Russell Brothers, and Dailey and Hilton.

John Drew follows the Lyceum Company at the Baldwin, presenting "Rosemary." Isabel Irving will be his leading lady.

Bronson Howard's war drama, "Shenandoah," will be given by the Frawley Company at the Columbia next Monday evening. "Shenandoah" is one of the most exciting and interesting plays of the Civil War. The story is natural and effecuve and the situations intensely dramatic, the most thrilling being the great ride of Sheridan and the retreat of the Confederates at the close of the third act.

Mr. Edward Stevens will open his season of light opera at the Tivoli Monday evening in a production of "Wang." Special scenery and costumes have been prepared. Mr. Stevens will impersonate Wang, a character in which he has been successfully identified for over a year in the cast. Miss Helen Harrington will reappear as the Widow Frimousse, and Miss Irma Fitch as Gilette, her oldest daughter. Myra Morella will be Mataya, the Crown Princess.

Quite the most interesting dramatic debut announced recently is that of Miss Amanda Josephi and Miss Josephine Culver, who will make their initial public appearance at Native Sons' Hall on the evening of June 30th. Both ladies are young, talented and handsome, and they are to appear in a series of character sketches, which will show off their ability to advantage. Mrs. Tilley Morrisey will assist with vocal selections.

LATE VERSE

Her Courtship.

A man of modern science wooed
A maiden of accepting mood,
Who, dreading lest contagion might
Do mischief to her chosen wight,
With sol. bichloride washed her hair
And likewise all her features fair.

She rinsed her mouth with Listerine,
And held, her snow-white teeth between,
A pad of antiseptic gauze,
Covering her nose, as well as jaws,
Which formed a sort of respirator
Between them and her osculator.

But this reminds: I should have told
That these were things he'd taught of old,
With others which I may not tell, in Regard to spots that germs might dwell in.
She was a wise professor's daughter
And practiced all which had been taught her.
—Buffalo Courier.

The Moving-Van.

Beside the monster moving van
The moving monarch stands;
You would not think to look at him,
With grime on face and hands,
That he is rich as rich can be
In stocks and bonds and lands.

His trousers are not in the mode,
His footgear is not tan,
His curses are both loud and deep,
He loves to rush the can;
But he looks the whole world in the face,
For he owns 'most every man.

The householder with woful face
Stands in the open door,
His women folks are flying round
From cellar to top floor,
To keep the man from smashing things—
He simply smashes more.
—Buffalo Courier.

So this good medicine man, with pride
Clasping his antiseptic bride,
In disinfected murmur low
Asked "Why she loved her doctor so?"
And softly nestling down, she sighed,
"You're such a dear old germicide."

Engaged!

SHE.

She lingers still in the driving mist,
Striving to keep his shadow in sight,
There's a tremulous smile on the lips he has kissed,
In her eyes shines a new sweet light;
And the sodden landscape fades away,
A shining path spreads before her feet,
Love's deathless domain she has entered today,
And, oh, to be living is sweet!

HE.

He, hurrying off to catch the train,
Hopes that his people will like the match;
What a lucky girl such a husband to gain,
For she wasn't much of a catch.
Well, the deed is done; the victim must pay;
How much did that dress cost she wore tonight?
She should make her own, there's a saving that way;
Once married he'll set all such things right.

HOW, WHEN AND WHERE

The Crucial Moment as Told in the Latest Novels.

Wonderful and many are the ways of making love and of asking the final, fatal question—as wonderful and many as the stars of the night, and as varied. The method of introducing the matrimonial topic depends altogether upon the man—as his temperament is so is the nature of the asking. There are all sorts of men possessing as many sorts of temperament, passionate and otherwise—principally otherwise. There is the man who says something about setting the day, and there is he who takes his Very-best out driving and makes conjugal remarks about comfortable looking houses. Then there is the practical man, who says something like this: "Well, Jennie, isn't it about time we—" a pause, a look, and then that case is settled. There is the impetuous young man, who is so very noisy, and the passionate man, who is so very deep and so very intense, who talks with his breath rather than his tongue. And there are others and others ad infinitum; but before them all is the poet, the man of dreams and fancies; after all he is the one who knows love best. Love is the poetry of life, and only the gentle poet possesses it in all its fullness.

But these are words, words some of them true and some of them idle; the thing is to consider the manner of proposing. Men will not do so on the roof-tops, nor in the streets, and as eavesdropping is very bad form, to say nothing of being uncomfortable, we must take ourselves to the playwright or the novelist. Let it be the novelist.

In Herbert D. Ward's pretty story, "The Burglar Who Moved Paradise," the "burglar," who is a very nice man, is talking to Miss Corona in her seaside home, which she has called Paradise—old maid's paradise, at that. Miss Corona has put the burglar off several times before; now he is desperate. They are discussing repairs that must be made in Paradise. Workmen are about the place; his chance has come, limited though it is; there is no one about, not a workman in sight; it is now or never. He takes her in his arms.

"It's no use, Corona," he whispers. "I love you so I can't wait."

"But, Zero," she flutters. Zero is the small boy. Miss Corona doesn't want him to have cause for talk.

"It shan't be called Old Maid's Paradise any longer if I can help it," he insists. "When shall we change the name, dear?"

"Not yet, oh Alec (Alec is the burglar's name), not yet, dear."

"Shall it be the middle of June? Quick." There is a munching of feet on the snow. "Quick—they are coming."

"Alec! Don't—yes, then—yes."

And it is all over, and Zero comes in without the least chance of seeing anything to talk about.

Here is love on horseback; it is in "Sweet Revenge," a story of the Civil War by F. A. Mitchell. They are in a woody road; he rides up close to her, and laying his hand on her horse's neck, strokes it for a moment; all this time his eyes are fixed on hers. He bends forward and without a word puts his arms about her and draws her to him. This seems to be the proper thing in nearly all cases—the putting around of arms and the drawing close to. The man of the horse puts his arms around the lady and draws her close, until her head sinks slowly and at last rests on the gold thread and things of his official breast. "Sweetheart, I love you," he whispers, "and I believe you love me." A pause follows, broken by the cooing of the creek and the billing of the birds; their lips meet, and their hearts thump as one. Stray strands of her hair fall on his wrist and a moisture comes in her eyes. She suddenly seeks to disengage herself, remembering several things—he is a Union officer and she a girl of the South, but he catches her, and holds her long enough for one more embrace, one long kiss, and then lets her go.

"The Duchess" labored long at the novelistic boom and spun many a tale of felicitous love. In her last work, "Lovice," she has half a dozen young people to marry off, which she manages to do quite happily. This is how one of her men makes the attempt—rather trite, it must be admitted. It is at a wedding and they are inspecting the presents.

"What a lovely ring," she says, taking up a hoop of diamonds and rubies.

"Yes," he returns eagerly. "You like rings? You fancy them?"

"I love them," she exclaims enthusiastically.

"Ah," and he sighs oppressively, "if I only dared to offer you one—a plain gold band."

But she doesn't see it that way; her heart is given in another direction, though the formal transfer is not made till later on. It is well on to the end of the book, and they have been cycling, but coming to a hill they dismount to walk. His name is Digby, hers is Louie. He has, or thinks he has, a rival in Colonel Grant, the sighing swain who would offer the fair Louie a plain gold band. They are almost at the summit; the Colonel is in the trees at the foot pumping a tire that has been maliciously unvalved by Digby, who is at present engaged in a jealous quarrel with Louie over the hapless Colonel. She declares she detests him.

"You mean it?" he says.

"Yes, I do."

"Then I think you are a girl of great discrimination, and as a reward of merit I shall allow you to marry me."

"Pouf," she replies, "I could have done that eighteen months ago."

Then follows a parley anent feminie conceit and the quality of the reward.

"Am I to understand you despise it?" he asks. They come to a stand on the summit; there is a pause, in which he finds time to put his arm around her waist. "Look here, Louie, you do like me a little b.., eh? Say you do, and that you will marry me, darling."

"I—I don't know," she stammers; "we are always quarreling."

"So much the better to get it all over now, and live happy ever after. Say yes, Louie," he adds coaxingly.

They are interrupted by a shout.

Louie's heart gives a little jump of joy.

"Oh, Digby, do take away your arm," Louie cries, very much alarmed. "Surely that is Colonel Grant's voice."

"Yes, but he is out of sight behind that clump of trees yet. I advise you to hurry up and say yes—he'll be here in no time. I do believe he is in sight," trying hard to imagine such to be the case.

"Oh, very well—yes—I mean no—I don't—"

"Here he is, really quite close."

"What a beast you are, Digby. But I must say yes—yes."

What follows is left to the imagination. Then mounting their bikes they speed away, and when the exhausted Colonel emerges from the trees he finds the road deserted.

So much for "The Duchess." Amelia Barr may come next with her "Prisoners of Conscience," a sombre story of the Shetland Islands. The people are simple fisherfolk, and one of them, David Borson, goes to woo Nanna Sinclair. The door of her house is open, and the wind blows the salt savor of the sea into the room. Nanna is knitting. David enters the house, shuts the door and goes to her side; his heart is too full to hesitate or to choose words.

"Nanna, I have found out that I love you," he says. Nanna, dearest woman, do you hear me?"

Her cheeks burn rosy, she looks at him, her hands tremble and the work falls from them.

"Love me a little, my dear! Love me, Nanna!"

"I do love you, David. Who in all the world have I but you?"

She stands up, he takes her in his arms, kisses her and is happy.

Now for Richard Harding Davis and his "Soldier of Fortune." Clay and Hope Langham are making their escape from the fire of their enemies; she is driving, couched between his knees, while he, bending over her, forms a protection from the bullets. The danger passed, the horses drop into a tired walk, the palms above them bend in benediction, the warm breeze carries the odor of ripening fruit, and the long leaves silver in the moonlight. Hope sinks slowly back and touches Clay's knee, then straightens herself as if to rise. He bends forward, as in a spell, and lays his hand fearfully on her shoulder. The touch seems to stop the blood in his veins and hush the words upon his lips. She raises her head slowly and looks into his eyes; it seems that he has been looking into those same eyes for centuries and has known them always and the soul that looked out of them. He bends his head lower, and stretching out his arms, draws her to him—her eyes do not waver—he raises her and holds her close against his breast—her eyes falter and close.

"Hope," he whispers, "Hope." He stoops lower and kisses her, and his lips tell her what they could not speak.

This how "The Descendant" has it:

"Rachel," he says, "will you listen to me?"

Rachel looks slightly bored.

"Not if it is long, please," she answers. "I am just as tired as I can be."

"It is not long," he says. "It is very short; it is only that I love you."

"I wish you wouldn't," she says pettishly. "I can't bear lovemaking; it's silly."

"It is not silly," he answers, "and it is not lovemaking; it is earnest, absorbing love. You may do what you please afterwards, but you must listen to me now. I tell you I love you, I love you, I love you! I have never said these words before in my life, and I never shall again. They are meant for you and you alone. * * * * * I love you, I love you. No, you can't get away. You shall hear me again—I love you!"

He speaks rapidly, his lips tremble, his face is white, his magnetic gaze illuminates her, scorching her as though the scintillating flames were shafts of fire. He reaches forward and takes her hands, holding them firmly in his own, bending still upon her that most impassioned glance. Rachel is duly impressed with all this, for she appropriately shivers, trembles and pales until her face seems of marble; but suddenly fear dawns in her eyes, they grow dark with suppressed tears—then she breaks from him and boils into wrath—just why, one must read the novel to find out. Rachel boils into wrath. "You are cruel, cruel, cruel," she cries. * * * * Why can't you leave me in peace? * * * * I hate you, I hate you!" and, her wrath having boiled, sinks on a couch and what is left of her dissolves into tears.

BOOK NOTES

The merit of "Leonora of the Yawmish, a tale of the Oregon woods, by Francis Dana, (Harper and Brothers), is almost entirely in its excellent local color and its title cover, a taking affair illuminated with long, slender pine trees, well needled and coned, through which may be seen a green mountain and a pink sky. The fair Leonora is a sort of modern Diana, and lives in the wilds of the Northwest with her father, a man of culture, who, like Timon of Athens, fled from his fellow-beings in general, and sought consolation in solitude. A young New Englander comes across Leonora while hunting, falls in love with her, or thinks he does, after a time proposes and is accepted. He soon returns to his Eastern home, where he meets an old sweetheart, now a lively widow. The feeling of first love returns, and at the widow's suggestion he sends out West his impecunious younger brother, very much like him in face and form, to win and wed the fair Leonora in his name. At the prospect of liberal reward the brother goes to Oregon, falls in love with Leonora, finally confesses his imposition, is forgiven, becomes wealthy in logging, marries the Yamish maid, and, after acquiring an immense fortune in a very short time, returns East. The descriptions of the country and its odd bits of inhabitants could hardly be improved upon, and for that reason, if for no other, the book is well worth reading.

"Mademoisells Blanche," by John D. Barry (Stone and Kimball), is an idyl of the circus, a tale of tears and sawdust. Mademoiselle Blanche is a young acrobat, as lovely as she is virtuous, who does a most remarkable act culminating in a marvelous leap for life. She becomes the wife of a young Frenchman, who loves her in a selfish sort of a way. He gives up business and becomes a sort of hanger-on and so-called manager of his wife's affairs—a very familiar type. After a time Blanche finds her health giving away, but continues performing, finding that only by doing so is she able to retain her husband's affection. The story ends pathetically with the death of Blanche in the circus net, killed by the wonderful leap. In "Mademoiselle Blancne" Mr. Barry has whitten of a loving and lovable woman in a most natural manner.

"A Singer's Heart," by Anna Farquhar (Roberts Brothers), starts out in a mild and amiable manner, improves rapidly as it continues, and developes into an interesting and readable story, resulting finally in an unexpected tragedy. The heroine is a young American with an unusual voice, red hair and a variable disposition. On the reversal of family fortunes she sets forth to study singing and meets with the vicissitudes that so frequently beset the ambitious damsel of slender means. She goes to Europe and finally becomes a great singer, indeed, a formidable rival to the only Adelina. She falls in love with a journalist, and the happiness of both seems imminent, when he dies of heart disease on the way to her side to propose marriage.

"THE QUESTION"

A Clever Satire by Lorimer Stoddard at the Columbia.

It is almost certain that if Lorrimer Stoddard's "Question" were produced in any other of the larger cities of America, other than this, it would score a pronounced success; equally probable is it that coming to San Francisco from the Eastern circuit the play would be received with enthusiasm. It is a thoroughly good piece of work; the audiences of the Columbia know very well that it is, and yet because of a couple of paragraphs in the daily papers they withhold their judgment and their applause. The most suprising feature of "The Ques .on" was this apathy on the part of the audience and its failure to catch the right points at the right time. A dozen or so claqueurs would not have been out of place on the opening night, for a score of times the house was moved to a stir of amusement when no amusement was intended or again sat stolid and imperturable through scenes and bits of dialogue that on other occasions would easily have provoked a clamor of intelligent recognition.

For one thing, San Francisco audiences are not keyed up to such a style of play as Mr. Stoddard and the Frawley Company have put on. Its best points are its most delicate. Exchange of repartee as bright and as evererescent as an electric spark, a bit of situation come and gone as quickly as a kinetascope picture, a touch of character acute and subtle as a lancet. Fresh from the highly colored, strongly marked melodramatic scenes of "The Fatal Card," and so many other of brusque, coarse-fibered plays that find their way to the Coast, it is perhaps not remarkable that "The Question" is slow to succeed. The difficulty about such a play is that it appeals strongest to a limite- public. It presupposes a rather unusual degree of intelligence on the part of its audience, an intelligence that can find more pleasure in an exchange of wit than in an exchange of blows, that rejoices in the thrust of keenly-pointed satire rather than in that of the assassin's knife. There are not many such people amongst San Francisco theater-goers. There were certainly few in the Columbia on the first night of "The Question." The house that foregathered beyond the footlights expected, in fact, desired, quite a different manner of play. They expected violent action and they got delicate insinuation. They wanted blood and they got an epigram. But the people who can appreciate Drew and the Daly companies should see "The Question." Frank Worthing is not "Lord Chevebrook, Mr. Stoddard "Pinero," but the drama which is the result of their combined effort is far and away ahead of the average of the dramatic work that has been of late produced in this city.

The dialogue, especially the dialogue between the women, fairly coruscates with brilliant repartee, so much so that the only criticism possible is that its cleverness is almost too pronounced to be true to life. There are, however, several little touches, here and there, so slight as to be almost impalpable, that do nevertheless add strongly to the impression of transemblance.

As, for instance, Mrs. Cannon's momentary forgetfulness of Oskamp's name, and her difficulty with that of Miss Quintard. Such points as this seem almost too trivial to mention, but they tell, they help, to create an impression. They are the "superflu si necessaire." Miss Moretti was cast in a role that seemed in some manner distasteful to her, and was not very effective. Miss Bates as Mrs. Cannon showed an admirable skill in the interpretation of a strong and sterling woman, superficially weak, and regardless of convention. It is a task of enormous difficulty and delicacy to strike precisely just the right note in the rendering of such a role, but never for a moment was Miss Bates' work out of tune. Such, too, was the case in Gladys Wallis' Miss Quintard, especially in what may be called for want of a better word the "champagne scene." It would have been the easiest thing imaginable to overdo this scene, and give an impression of coarseness and vulgarity. In Miss Wallis' hands it was veritably delicious, and indeed as much can be said of her entire role. As Miss Quintard she is quite as charming as any actress of her kind seen here this season.

It is perhaps niggardly to foggle over details, but the rustling of the leaves, that so conveniently adapts itself to Mrs. Cannon's lines in the second act might be omitted with advantage. Mrs. Cannon's words would have just as much significance without it, and the effect is neither natural nor artistic. It is thrust upon the audience at that particular time and at no other. But the fact that so trifling a criticism could be hazarded at all is perhaps the best proof of the excellence of the entire performance.

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh That Contain Mercury

as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten-fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure, be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally, and is made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co. Testimonials free.

TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG.

The Tavern of Castle Crag was built in the heart of the Sierras, almost at the foot of Mount Shasta, and amid the most picturesque mountain scenery accessible to the tourist. The eligibility of the place selected was due to a rare combination of flowing water, inspiring mountain scenery and inviting forests.

The Tavern of Castle Crag, with its splendid environment, it was believed would appeal chiefly to those who seek a summer resort for health, recreation, outdoor sports, sympathy with nature and informal sociability. To emphasize this intention and signify the kind of invitation extended, the name TAVERN of Castle Crag was chosen.

To avoid all implication of sumptuous accommodations or the tyranny of social formalism, and to realize this original conception, the management has decided to make the Tavern of Castle Crag distinctively a family resort and especially attractive to those to whom health, recreation and sympathy with nature are paramount considerations. To this end rooms on the first and second floors of this splendid tavern with board will be furnished at a monthly rate of $65 a person; and rooms on the third floor with board at a monthly rate of $50 a person.

The accommodations of the Tavern are first class in every particular. Its parlors and halls are elegant and spacious. Its verandas are cool and inviting, placing the guest always in the presence of the most attractive mountain scenery to be enjoyed from the balcony of any tavern in the world.

The opportunity for out door sports embraces hunting, fishing, riding, bicycling, walking on mountain paths and driving on picturesque roads. The Tavern is located immediately on the main trunk line of the California & Oregon Railroad, and is fourteen hours' ride from San Francisco, twelve hours from Stockton, ten hours from Sacramento, thirty hours from Los Angeles and twenty-three hours from Portland. The Tavern of Castle Crag is reached from San Francisco and Sacramento without loss of time. The train leaves San Francisco at 8 o'clock p. m., arriving early the following morning for breakfast, which is always ready upon the arrival of the train. Returning, the train time affords equal accommodation. Thus, both in going and in coming the comfort of the passenger and the economy of his time have been studied. In brief, the Tavern of Castle Crag realizes to its guests the perfect ideal of that spring-time in the high altitudes of the Sierras which never becomes high summer, and is the comfortable home of pleasing recreation and restful repose.

TURF TOPICS

Sales of Thoroughbred Yearlings in New York — Breeding Notes.

The American invasion of England is being attended this season with a very fair measure of success. Keenan, Mr. August Belmont's representative in the all-ageu division, Berzak, the Lorillord three-year-old, by Sensation, and Mr. Croker's two-year-old Rhoda B., by Hanover, are all highly regarded, and in a fair way to secure honor, as well as considerable profit, for their respective stables. Berzak, by all accounts, is not unlikely to grow into a really good horse before many moons have gone by. Rhoda B. is not very fully engaged, which is unfortunate, as she seems to be one of the best two-year-olds racing in England this season. She is expected to face the starter this week in the New Stakes at Ascot, and if she beats Mr. Perkins' smart colt by Bend Or—Jenny Howlett her reputation will have been made.

The uninitiated are often at a loss to understand the enormous prices that are paid now and then for first-class horses by racing and breeding men. When the possibilities in the way of returns are considered, however, there is no real cause for wonderment. Take, for instance, the case of Hampton, whose career of service is now closed. Born in 1872, he was purchased after his first win as a two-year-old for 200 guineas and five years later became the property of Lord Ellesmere for the sum of 7,200 guineas. During his career on the turf he won £7,735, and, up to the end of last season, had sired 137 winners of 433 races—value, £222,632; three winners of the Derby, namely, Merry Hampton, Ayrshire and Ladas, as well as one Oaks winner, Reve d'Or, being amongst his produce. As a sire he began with the modest fee of 30 guineas, which was soon advanced to 150 guineas, at which it remained.

The attempt is still being made to stimulate public interest in the scheme of operating a race track on the Marin county side of the bay, so as to furnish the gambling element with employment during the summer. When the promoters can make it appear that they desire to furnish good sport and not merely to exploit bookmaking projects their plans will receive consideration at present wanting.

At the first important sale this season of thoroughbred yearlings, held at the American Horse Exchange, New York, there were 30 head disposed of at an average of $347, the highest price being $3,725, paid by I. E. Madden, of Lexington, Ky., for Glenheim, a colt by Hanover—imp. Cinderella. The sale was composed of consignments from the McGrathiana, Dixiana, Runnymede, Woodburn, Melbourne, and Larchmont studs. Eleven youngsters were purchased by I. H. McCormick, the trainer, for Burns & Waterhouse, the highest priced one of the lot being a bay colt by Falsetto—Pearl Thorne by Pat Malloy, knocked down to them at $1,250.

The sale above mentioned is the equivalent in quantity of the Rancho del Paso offerings to be made in New York this coming week. It will be interesting to see how the financial results compare, and what light they throw on the breeding of thoroughbred stock in California and Kentucky respectively.

The English critics, according to my information, seem disposed to reckon Galtee More a "smasher" worthy to take rank with his kinsman, Ormonde. Unfortunately for the comparison, however, this year's Derby winner was beaten once, the second time out, in his two-year-old career, namely, by Brigg in the Great Lancashire Breeders' Produce Stakes (£1,611), whereas Ormonde never owned defeat in his life. Moreover, the class generally this season does not seem to compare with the quality of the horses that were running during Ormonde's three-year-old career. It is certainly too early yet to define Galtee More's precise place amongst the best horses of the present era. The only opponent that has come anywhere near getting his measure this season is Velasquez, who, it seems, has been a sufferer from teething troubles and by no means, therefore, in the best fettle. It is quite on the cards that Lord Rosebery's colt may show improved form later in the season, though there seems to be an impression that he is not going to make a long-distance champion. Mr. Gubbins' horse is no doubt a great colt, and the only time he was defeated, as mentioned above, he was distinctly interfered with in the race. From the pictures I have seen, and which look to be very good, Galtee More stands all over Velasquez, and the appearance of each horse fully bears out their respective merits so far as they have at present been determined.

The St. Simon blood has not been holding its own this season up to date, but if Persimmon annexes the gold cup at Ascot for the Prince of Wales this week, as he should do, things will look a little brighter in that direction.

Here is a good story from "Country Life" of Newmarket trainers' methods with their boys: "Can't quite do it, I'm afraid, Mr. Burnish," a pale, thin, ravenous-looking lad observed to a well-known trainer one race morning, "but I'm within three-quarters of a pound, sir—we shall 'ave to give that away, I s'pose?"

"Give nothin' away, fat-head," grunted the frowning trainer. "You must a bin breakfastin'?"

"Wishamadie if I've 'ad anythin' but a warnut an' 'alf a pint o' warm castor oil since the day before yesterday, sir."

"H—m!" returned the other. "Hau a Turkish bath?"

"Two, this blessed mornin'."

"Took a walk?"

"Fourteen mile, with three suits o' clothes on."

"H—m!" repeated his master, digging his ash-plant into the turf. "Then you shall just run to Ely an' back behind my dog-cart an' get your toe-nails cut afterwards. I'll have you the right weight, my lad, if I have to drag out every tooth in your head, stoppin' an' all."

The four miles record performance of Lucretia Borgia has attracted a great deal of attention throughout the country, and it will not be surprising if it leads to an attempt being made before long to beat the time she made with more weight up.

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

Certain members of the Chamber of Commerce were discussing the ability of Germans to drink beer, and one of them offered to wager that any Teuton out of a crowd at work on a building near by could drink a gallon of lager without stopping. The party approached a sturdy looking stone mason, and the sporting man asked: "Will you drink a bucketful of beer if I pay for it?" The mason thought a minute. "Vell, I drink it if I can. I don't know, though, if I can. You wait a minute." He disappeared into Leidesdorff street, but returned a moment later, smiling. "All right," he said, "I vas ready." They went into an adjoining saloon and the Teuton drank the gallon of lager without a wink. Coming back to his mallet and chisel, he said: "I vas not sure if I could drink a pail of beer or not, so I vent into Chris Olsen's and tried it first."

During the sham battles at the Presidio, it is often necessary, for purposes of instruction, to indicate with signs the location of bodies of stationary troops at certain points. Quite recently a young officer charged down upon an apparently isolated man of the opposing force. The man made no attempt to escape, but stood quietly holding a long staff with a board nailed thereon. "You're my prisoner," said the officer with the body of cavalry. "Beg pardon, sir," returned the isolated one, "I'm a brigade!" Fortunately there was no umpire looking just then, so the body of cavalry rapidly headed for a less dangerous part of the country, while the "brigade" was left grinning alone.

A year or two ago a Colusa county rancher who had loaded up too heavily with debt during the flush times was gathered in by the bank on a foreclosure sale. Recently his son was asked how his father was getting on, and he replied, "Oh, he is doing a great deal better now. He rents the land from the bank and doesn't have to pay interest." This was not a joke, but a fact. The farmer gives the bank one-third of the crop for the use of its land, and keeps two-thirds for his labor; formerly three-thirds would hardly have sufficed to pay interest.

In the old days of patronage a Scotch minister was once forced upon a congregation. He was coldly received; but, calling one day upon an elder, he took a chair in spite of his gruff reception. In order to meet an awkward pause, he took out his snuff-box. "Oh," said the elder, "ye tak' snuff, dae ye?" "Oh, yes," was the reply. "Weel," said the elder, that's the first sign o' grace I've seen in ye." "How's that?" "Dae no read o' Solomon's temple," replied the elder, "that a' the snuffers were of pure gold?"

When the celebrated Bishop Wilberforce was a student at Oxford, he had a chum whose habit was to come into his friend's room at breakfast-time and smoke a huge pipe. Wilberforce could not abide his bacon and toast saturated with tobacco-smoke, but he was at a loss to know how to convey the necessary hint. At last one morning he remarked apologetically, "I say, old chap—you'll excuse me—I hope you don't mind—but do you object to my going on with my breakfast while you are smoking?"

Rubenstein, the great pianist, was seldom at a loss for an answer. A lady once begged him for a seat at his concert, where, of course, there was not a single place to be had. "I have only one seat," he said, "but I will willingly give it up to you." "Oh, thank you! How good you are! Really I don't know what I have done to deserve such kindness! And where is the seat?" "At the piano."

A well-known Parisian who is credited with having made his escape from the fire with remarkable vigor and promptitude, was some little time afterwards pushing aside a lady in his attempt to get before her into a theater. She found it hard to keep her place. At last, losing patience, she turned round and said: "Remember, sir, that this is not the Charity Bazar." He at once collapsed.

An Irish member of Parliament the other day said that Mr. Balfour's statement of the British Government's new Irish policy "came like a windfall out of a clear sky," and an English musical journal recently said that an operatic manager had "unearthed a new star."

A country curate, calling on the great lady of the village, introduced his newly married wife as "a poor thing, madam, but mine own"; whereupon the lady, looking upon the curate severely, replied: "Your wife ought to have introduced you as 'a poorer thing, but mine owner.'"

DEBS' CO-OPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH.

It is only a few days since the illustrious Eugene V. Debs was heard from at Salt Lake City echoing the advice which the blood-thirsty Boyce of the Miners' Federation there gave to his followers. That advice was that each miner should equip himself with a firearm of the latest and best model and drill himself in the use of his weapon till he should be able to do good execution with it upon the foes of "Labor." Then, it seemed, in the opinion of Debs and Boyce, that the time when such execution would be called for was not far distant, but in the short time since the meeting at Salt Lake City a great change seems to have come over Debs, and now he is preaching a new gospel for the salvation of "Labor," in which, so far as appears from the text as published, there is no clash of arms or smell of powder smoke. It was at Chicago, last week, that the new programme of Debs was given to the world, and a very significant programme it is, coming from one who has so long been the apostle of practical anarchy. The design is nothing less than that Debs and several thousand of his followers shall go to work. With Debs as their Moses, these thousands are to be led forth from the Eastern Egypt, the land of "industrial slavery," into some promised land in some Western State, where there are millions of fertile acres that can be easily irrigated. On these acres, when they get them, the tribes of Debs will plow, sow and reap, build stores and factories, dig canals, make roads, build schoolhouses and other public buildings, including a printing establishment for the production of newspapers and "literature of the right kind." There is to be a common store for the supply of all the wants of the colonists, and even a common kitchen from which the cooked rations of the faithful will be distributed to them—a much better arrangement than relying on the manna of the wilderness. Of course the colony is to produce a great deal more than it will need, and the surplus is to be sold to the rest of the world, in competition with the produce of the farmers who selfishly till the soil on their own individual accounts. It would, no doubt, be a great and painful surprise to the colonists if these selfish farmers, taking a leaf from the old philosophy of Debs, were to denounce them as "scabs" and resent by riot and arson and force of arms such irregular intrusion into the industry of agriculture. The whereabouts of the promised land is as yet rather indefinite. Debs represents that "dozens of States" are bidding for the honor of the impending invasion, but this may be safely regarded as an exaggeration due to the first fever of socialistic enthusiasm. Only four States are mentioned as finding favor in the eyes of the leaders of the new exodus—Texas, Utah, Idaho and Washington—and it is, perhaps, a mere coincidence that in each of these States some form of populism is the prevailing political faith, to which the votes of the Debs contingent would be a very acceptable accession of strength. How the pilgrims of the new faith are to get to the land of promise is another question not answered in the prospectus. Debs thinks that some of them may have to walk. We should think that they would all take to that independent method of transportation rather than contribute one shekel from the treasury of the faithful to the soulless overlords of labor who manage railroads.

It needs no skill in prophecy to foretell the result of such an attempt as Debs has proposed, if it is ever seriously made. It is simply an experiment in practical socialism, and an experiment which has been repeatedly tried by wiser and more prudent men than Debs and his disciples, by associations with greater resources than his poor followers will be able to furnish, and under more favorable circumstances and in more favored regions than he will probably find in any portion of the Western wilderness still remaining unredeemed. In every instance the promoters of such socialistic schemes have held up before their followers the same glorious visions of ease and plenty and independence with which Debs seeks to inspire the new movement. It is always a part of the gospel of socialism that the individual in the community can produce more and with less effort than he can by independent exertion in the same line of work, and the uniform result of repeated experiments has been to give the lie to this article of the socialistic faith, and to make over and over again the demonstration that the only efficient and economic form of co-operation yet possible is that in which each worker exerts himself to what he believes to be his own advantage in the industry for which he believes himself best fitted. Even if there were no fundamental defects in Debs' theory of co-operation, it would still be impossible for him to erect a stable and prosperous community on the foundations which he proposes to lay. If he has ever been a real workingman he must recognize the impossibility of making successful farmers out of a rabble of the unemployed gathered up from the great cities, not one in fifty of whom has any practical or theoretical knowledge of the difficulties which the successful farmer has to meet and overcome. And it adds nothing to the chance of Debs' success that he has associated with him in his new crusade a number of professors and preachers more distinguished for kindly sentiment, perhaps, than for good sense. They are all of the school which believes and teaches that human institutions can be made over anew without any making over of the human nature which has evolved them in their present form. If crops could be brought out of the ground by talk, or if the wheels of factories could be turned by tongue-power, such auxiliaries would be valuable to the new enterprise, but under no other conditions.

It is announced by the friends of Debs that the once potent American Railway Union is by its former leader regarded as dead. It might be profitable and instructive to the deluded thousands who formed that organization to hold an inquest on its remains and to determine, if possible, of what it died. Perhaps a statement contained in Debs' announcement of the new crusade may shed light on the question. He says: "Trades unionism furnishes no adequate remedy for the terrible evil which confronts the toilers. If all the workers in the country were organized at the present time and engaged in a concerted warfare with capital, they would be beaten." Here, at least, is truth from Debs. So long as the purpose of labor organizations is "concerted warfare" on capital, which alone can furnish them a market for their labor and with which it should be their primary purpose to co-operate, they must be beaten. Debs' followers saw the futility of "concerted warfare" before Debs acknowledged it. Now he seeks to turn a new trick, in which his failure must be speedy. We opine that we shall soon hear the last of Debs.

CLERICAL DEGENERATION.

About a year and a half ago, a clergyman who had long been the pastor of a prominent church in San Francisco was publicly accused of gross immoralities, offenses involving a high degree of moral turpitude, and especially disgraceful to one who had assumed the functions of an expounder of revealed truth and an exemplar of pure living. There followed a reluctant examination of the charges, by the governing body of the church over which the accused pastor presided, in which was developed all the characteristic and too familiar features of the "church trial." The non-judicial character of the ordinary religious mind was exemplified by the attitude of a numerous cohort of the friends of the accused clergyman who, in spite of the most apparent truth against him and the most transparent falsehood put forth in his behalf, clung to their pastor as if faith in him and in his moral infallibility was a condition of their personal salvation. After a trial the accounts of which filled columns of the daily papers with the most nauseous details of the reverend delinquent's doings, and which probably wrought more moral harm to this community than could be repaired by the labor of a lifetime of the sinner, if repentant, the pastor was adjudged guilty and unfit to continue in the exercise of his sacred functions, and this judgment was confirmed by the local body of clergymen of the sect to which he belonged. It was supposed that the end of the matter had been reached then, and that the convicted sinner would depart into that obscurity which most men, clerical or lay, would have welcomed after such an experience as his had been. To every candid mind the rehabilitation of such a man and his restoration to the honorable station of a teacher of morals and preacher of truth seemed a moral impossibility. But the reverend sinner knew the cast of the clerical mind better than the public, in spite of what seems to have been ample means of instruction, has yet learned to know it. He betook himself, after a brief period of rest, to another field, and there applied to the association of the clergymen of his sect for admission to their number as one qualified in all respects to preach the gospel and to lead souls to salvation. There was no evidence produced in refutation of that on which his own brethren in San Francisco had condemned him, and there was not even a re-examination of the testimony on which he was convicted here, yet his fellow clerics, by an overwhelming majority, accepted him as one worthy to stand with them in the battle which they profess to be waging against vice and crime and falsehood and unbelief. This man, cast out as a moral leper from the community in which he lived, condemned as a criminal by the ordained preachers of the faith which he professed, in the place where his crimes were committed, has only to go to Chicago and there slander the people who had cast him off, and forthwith he is accepted as one of themselves by the exponents of the same faith, is made pastor of a church and exercises again the cure of souls!

The guilt of such a man is of very trifling significance, but the acceptance of such a man and his reinstatement in the ministry at the hands of his fellow clergymen is of very striking significance. The action of the ministers of the Chicago Association was not the casting of the mantle of charity over the past offenses of a sinner doing penance, for the sinner was not repentant, but defiant, and those who took him to their hearts as a brother certainly displayed no charity to their distant brethren in California. In no gathering or association of men of any other occupation or profession could such a substitution of emotion and prejudice for evidence and judgment be looked for. If any association of physicians or lawyers or engineers were to act in like manner in the case of one of their number charged with unprofessional conduct, and should come to a conclusion so flatly in violation of the common sense of justice, the authority and public standing of such an association would be rudely shaken; and it is safe to say that the profession as a whole would take pains to express its emphatic dissent from such a conclusion. Yet the clergy, who profess to be guided by a higher code than is recognized by any other of the learned professions, accept, without audible protest, actions which would disgrace a boss-ruled political convention.

The assumed function of ministers of religion is to teach, and to teach by authority. It will be apparent to any one who will read the reports of sermons in the daily papers that they do not confine their teaching to the more or less abstract dogmas and doctrines of their several sects, but that they are more and more inclined to lay down laws for the guidance of their hearers in their political, social and business affairs. Of the value of such teaching delivered with good judgment by men of learning and reason there can be no question. It is accepted that ecclesiastics shall be the counsel for their several creeds, and the champions of foregone conclusions in matters of abstract belief, but the value of the pulpit as a power for social good will not suffer for that reason so long as it is occupied by men of good ability and of clean lives. But it is the duty of the clergy as a whole, to defend themselves against the consequences of such an action as that taken by the Congregational Conference of Chicago, who have given another instance to be cited by those who maintain that the clergy are deteriorating and the clerical mind degenerating.

MUNICIPAL REGULATION OF GAS AND WATER RATES.

A novel suit relating to water rates has recently been brought against the City of Oakland on the relation of a stockholder in one of the two water companies of that city. A lawyer's clerk, holding a trifling amount of stock which was transferred to his name in the hope of qualifying him to maintain such an action, has filed a lengthy printed complaint, alleging that the water rates fixed by the City Council are unjust and unreasonable, inasmuch as they are so low that the corporation in which he is a stockholder would, under them, be unable to pay operating expenses and interest. Besides declaring the rates unfair, the newly-fledged stockholder seeks to have the order of the board set aside, upon the ground that the schedule was adopted without a hearing or any investigation, and is therefore illegal and void.

In view of all the surrounding circumstances the suit is novel. Two rival water companies have for a year or more engaged themselves in a rate war. The price of water has gone down to practically nothing. Corporate dividends were long ago suspended, and the stockholder in lieu of profit has been forced to contemplate rapidly shrinking stock values. Both companies claim to be losing money on the operation, and they doubtless speak the truth. The rates fixed by the Council, by which the newly-born stockholder complains, are far higher than the rates voluntarily fixed by the companies themselves. The corporations are not suffering by reason of the schedule adopted by the Council, yet a stockholder seeks to have the latter rate decreed unjust, and its adoption by the Council without investigation illegal.

If the court will consider the case on its merits—and it seems doubtful that it will do so on the relation of a stockholder without the corporation itself being made a party—it will open up a new and interesting field of law. May a corporation insist upon a due observance of all the formalities of investigation and a fixing of rates based upon valuation, money invested and operating expenses, notwithstanding it has itself elected to reduce rates far below the point of profit? So far as we know, the question is new. But there is another peculiar phase to the Oakland situation. As the mortgage debt, the capital stock and operating expenses form the basis of all legislative regulations, it would seem, there being two purveyors of water in Oakland, that the Council would be compelled to investigate separately as to each, and if there was a wide difference in the sum of these three items would likewise be compelled to fix different rates for each company. For instance, the Dingee company, with a small capital invested, might be compelled to furnish water at a lower rate than that fixed for the Contra Costa company, with its larger plant and more extensive reservoirs and pipe system. So that legally there would exist in Oakland two water schedules fixed by the same Council at the same time, yet varying in rates. Under such a proceeding—and technically that would be the only legal method the Council could adopt—the company having the largest capital invested—other things being equal—would be entitled to charge the maximum rate where there was no competition, and to cut rates in the portions of the city that had been invaded by its rival.

The Oakland situation admirably illustrates a contention we have repeatedly urged, viz., that competition offers the only true method of reducing gas, water or any other rates. To satisfy the demands of those who constantly clamor for rate reductions would be impossible. To be perfectly plain, this class of citizen is more noisy than numerous and more insincere than honest. To comply with their exactions would compel us to bow to that hollow mockery they dignify as "a doctrine built upon principles of public policy," which runs to confiscation. It is that doctrine of which the Examiner stands as the chief exponent. We need water and gas and transportation facilities. They are a public necessity. Development without them would be impossible. The individual who inaugurates such an enterprise is to some extent a public benefactor. His primary object may be personal profit, but wherever his enterprise extends, be it rails for transportation or pipes for gas or water, neighboring property is enhanced in value, and residence there made possible. Cut off from any portion of the city either gas, water or transportation facilities, and you may begin to realize the extent to which the community profits by such enterprises. The doctrine advocated by the professional "rate regulators" would make all such property a public prey, and the fortunes invested therein public playthings to be tossed and buffeted about in the municipal halls of legislation and for the profit of the miserable wretch who is "out for the stuff."

The Examiner insinuates that the Board of Supervisors were corruptly procured to vote for what is known as the Haskins ordinance. Assuming this is true, what is the situation? Under the laws of the State the Supervisors are compelled to annually fix the rates to be charged for water, and in so fixing they are hedged in by well settled rules, which demand first a fair and impartial hearing, and finally the fixing of a just and reasonable rate. It is contemplated that "a just and reasonable rate" must provide for at least three things. First, the payment of operating expenses; second, the payment of interest on the bonded indebtedness, and, third, the payment of interest to stockholders. The rates just fixed by the board permits the corporation to meet their obligations, but nothing more. In considering rates it would hardly be practicable for the board to declare operating expenses exorbitantly high, and order a reduction on that account, for it is reasonable to assume, with hundreds of watchful stockholders, legally entitled to examine the books of the concern and directly interested in judicious and economical management, extravagances in this direction would hardly be possible. Nor could the Supervisors consider interest on the bonded indebtedness as fair game for their pruning knife, for this fixed expense is a matter of contract which the corporation may not avoid and cannot reduce so long as the present series of bonds are outstanding. There is but one other direction in which the rate reducer may look, and that is to the stockholder. It would seem as though this unfortunate being above all others interested should be entitled to the highest rate of interest. He takes all the risks and assumes all the liabilities. His security fluctuates with every whim of the money market or raid of the demagogue. But it was upon this class of investors the municipal regulators thought it best to level their attacks. The notch to which the rates might be reduced seemed to hinge upon what was a fair rate of intehest for the stockholder. If we were to take every one seriously who has an opinion upon this subject the rate of interest would go dwindling down from 6 per cent. to 5, 4, 3, 2, 1, and, finally, to satisfy the man who believes that money is not entitled to earn money, we would soon reach the vanishing point. Argument could never be unanimous upon this subject. The order adopted by the board observed all the requirements demanded by law. It would seem that so long as the corporation was keeping within the letter and spirit of the law, and paying only an ordinary rate of interest to its stockholders, that agitation could answer no good purpose. Even if the Supervisors acted upon the suggestion for lower rates, it is questionable whether the facts would justify or the courts uphold the reduction.

Upon its own statement the Examiner's agitation has only resulted in creating a market for Supervisors' votes. There was no wide or general complaint among actual rate payers. Indeed, had it not been for that journal the public would never have been told that they were paying excessive rates. This kind of thing has been going on for years. Annually the same old cry of corruption springs up, and the charge is openly made upon the assumption that no man may be honestly convinced of the corporation's fairness. This is a cheap method of acquiring a reputation for incorruptibility and explaining your own defeat, but, if it is true, agitation has made it more expensive to operate a water company in this city, and has fattened the purses of the corrupt Supervisor with money that must eventually come out of the water consumer. Assuming then that a majority of our Board of Supervisors is corrupt, where is the profit to the community in agitating this or any other question that would make it possible for them to sell their votes? Such a proceeding, under the circumstances, simply plays into the hands of corruption.

If the Examiner's theory is correct, it is impossible to elect an honest Board of Supervisors in this city. Then let us cease to make it profitable for that class to seek public office. If there is to be any rate agitation let them raise it among themselves, and meanwhile treat the corporation fairly, and in all likelihood the novelty of decent treatment would encourage the corporation to extend its service to portions of our city that stand sadly in need of water. Perhaps, too, with peace and the natural increase of consumers, rates may voluntarily be reduced. The experiment is worth trying.

COMMUNICATION.

Wardner, Idaho, May 20th, 1897.

Editor "Wave"—

Dear Sir: In your issue of May 15th I notice a leading article referring to one Edward Boyce, President of the Western Federation of Miners, who recently made an inflammatory speech before that body at Salt Lake City. In the editorial referred to you have made one or two mistakes which I wish to correct.

In the first place, you give his residence as Wardner, Idaho. Permit me, as a resident of this maligned place, to correct this error. Boyce is not a resident of Wardner, neither has he been for several years past; the fact that he at one time owned a cabin here does not entitle him to a residence. In fact, the only time he has been in this town for over one year was one night last February, when he, in company with Debs and others of the same kidney, made a speech here. I can safely say that if Boyce had been alone on that occasion he would not have had a corporal's guard to hear him. The people of Wardner are heartily tired of Boyce and his methods. Now, Mr. Editor, you are not to blame for not knowing the address of this man Boyce, as it would give his most intimate friends some trouble to definitely locate him; but you are very much mistaken when you say that the residents of Wardner celebrate or in any way sympathize with him or his clique in their observation of the anniversary of the destruction of the Frisco mill and the taking of human life at that time. The town where this event is celebrated is at Wallace, and not at Wardner. This celebration is in no way countenanced by the people of Wardner, but rather is looked upon with abhorrence.

The fact that Boyce spoke so vehemently against the National Guard may be charged to two reasons: First, the part played by that organization in the recent great strike at Leadville, Colorado; secondly, that at Wardner is located the only body of that organization in the Couer d'Alenes. This organization has the hearty support of ninety per cent. of the residents of this vicinity, and it is due to its presence that Boyce and his followers cannot work their own sweet will on this community. I hope that you will set us right before the world, for we have enough to bear without having this demagogue thrust upon us, either as a leader or we as disciples of his teachings. Yours very truly,

G. P. PENFIELD.

THE REGENTS ARRAIGNED

Glaring Misuse of the State University's Appropriation.

If the Regents of the State University were bent on arousing popular distrust of themselves and their institution, if they had made up their minds to sweep away in a few months all that has been gained in the last five years, they would not have acted in a manner much differing from their recent performances. That the greater number of the Regents mean well by the University, we have repeatedly maintained, and do not even now doubt. But it will be difficult to convince the people of the State that such is the case, in the light of latter events. That the Regents have shown themselves to be the ready tools of designing politicians and of intriguing professors is apparent at a glance. Just how the wire pulling has been accomplished is a matter which future developments will probably bring out much more clearly. At present, the obvious fact is that the Regents have most shamefully failed to exhibit even ordinary common sense, much less the ability and integrity which we have a right to expect from them.

When the people were called upon to increase the University's income last fall, they were assured that the institution was overcrowded—badly in need of new men and new buildings. Class-rooms were said to have "standing-room only," instructors were overworked, laboratory courses dropped from lack of space, and the impression that the institution was much in the condition of a New York tenement house was generally spread abroad. Well, the Alumni worked, the people gave, the University celebrated, and then the field was cleared for the Regents. The multitude held its breath, waiting for these doughty champions of the higher education to knock the incubus of overwork and overcrowding "galley west."

They began by raising sundry professors in rank. How much raise in salary accompanied this is not now known. The Regents have a way of keeping these matters from the public. But any one acquainted with the past history of such proceedings in the University knows that the raise in salary in any case is only a matter of time. It has become quite the thing of late to divide a raise up, giving the rank first—an innocent appearing thing when unaccompanied by an increase of salary, and then, later, raising the salary to correspond with the rank—a mere act of justice, you see. Just how this relieves the tension is not clear to ordinary people. An increased salary or a new title is a novel remedy for an overworked brain—how superior to Weir Mitchell's cumbersome and tedious rest cure!

In the matter of buildings the Regents have exhibited their usual dilatoriness. At the end of the last year it was said that the new structure would be up for the opening of the fall term. Vacation is nearly half over now, and nothing has been seen of it. The University will open next fall with less accommodations in the way of buildings than ever—for the new Agricultural Building will not be finished—and with its badly "overworked" faculty as overworked as ever, with a few exceptions. Nay, more so, if the apparently overworked condition of the Regents is evidence.

But let us not be rash in condemning the extravagance of these faithful servants of the people. A notable instance of economy has lately come to light, just in time in fact to save their reputation for wise administration. The salaries of janitors have been reduced five dollars! These bloated bondholders have hitherto enjoyed the princely income of sixty dollars per month. Of course, since none of them have any one but wife and children dependant upon them, the possession of so much might lead to a degree of extravagance which would set a bad example to the young idea at Berkeley. Moreover, the cut of five dollars will effect a net saving to the University of four or five hundred dollars per year. Enough to give Professor ——— the salary corresponding to his new title of full professor—enough, perhaps, to pay his bills at the University Club!

The most maddening thing about this reduction in the janitors' pay is that it is not only wrong and unnecessary, and small, but woefully impolitic If the Regents had been looking for something to do by which, with the least effort, they could most thoroughly spread the notion that the University is essentially an upper-class institution, opposed to the interests of the common people, nothing better than this cut in the janitors' salaries could have been devised, coming as a sequel to the apparent increase of that of a number of professors. Of course, we who know the University know that it is not an upper-class institution, and that the cut means nothing but that a well-meaning but blundering Board of Regents has been trying to balance its cash account in its usual short-sighted and blundering fashion. We know it only means that, pulled this way and that by struggling factions, the Board has had to land on its feet as best it might, and that this year it has done so with more than usual lack of grace and dignity. But the people of California, who have to judge by appearances, what will they say?

And now little Consuelo Vanderbilt, Duchess of Marlborough, is to be decorated with some sort of order apropos of Mrs. Wettin's diamond jubilee. One does not exactly see why Mrs. Wettin should give to Mrs. Churchill a little golden cross. There is no doubt some reason in it, some reason that you and I and all the rest of us don't understand, just as there is doubtless some unexplicable reason why nine million of people should howl themselves hoarse because Mrs. Wettin has kept her situation for sixty years. Of course, it must be very nice to keep one's place—and at so large a salary—for so long a time—and it must be good fun to preside at the opening of guild halls and institutions, and to press the button that launches battle ships, and to have a chair and an umbrella when corner stones are laid, and perhaps you and I and all the rest of us could not do it so neatly and in such dignified manner. That is all very well, but I can't for the life of me see why nine million of people should make complimentary remarks of Mrs. Wettin because of the great number of great things that have happened during the time she has kept her place. They say she is good and virtuous, and they say it—these Londoners—in a hundred and fifty thousand different ways, and write down what they say in gay colored letters and hang 'em up publicly. It's very charming, I'm sure, of Mrs. Wettin to be good and virtuous, but I know of a little waitress in a down-town coffee joint in this city who is good and virtuous, too, and several other young women who are just as good and just as virtuous, and yet somehow they worry along without diamond jubilees and nine million of people to rejoice and wonder at their goodness and virtue. And as for the wonderful things that have come about during Mrs. Wettin's time, it seems to me they would have happened any way whether Mrs. Wettin was there or not. If old Mammy Pleasant had had Mrs. Wettin's place I think the telegraph would have been invented just the same, and the telephone and locomotive. But it's an English show, and they have a right to do as they please when they own the place.

Speaking of the people who own the place, it is understood that the proprietors along the line of march have had a sudden set back in the matter of obtaining high prices for seats. Only in the circle about St. Paul's are prices firm. Elsewhere the thing has been overdone and there's a reaction. You must part with five guineas before you can get a place in front of St. Paul's, but $10 or $15 will seat you nicely enough almost anywhere. The trouble began with the sudden hegira of Americans from London. They all at once made up their minds that they would not be robbed of their money merely for the sake of seeing Mrs. Wettin's show, and rather than be in London that day with its roaring nine millions, they have begun to go toward the country. The move has brought a collapse in hotel prices as well. Now you can get a room at Morley's or similar hostelries for Ascot or Derby prices.

By the way, trade is at a standstill; only the milliners, florists and tailors are doing any business. The other places are closing up. Everybody is on the streets and no one dreams of doing business. It is like a succession of Xmas days, but the florists, the milliner and the tailors rest not neither day or night. Anything apropos of Mrs. Wettin is good copy now at the rate of $7 per 1,000 words. The "latest Wettin sensation" is that the lady in question has dropped a tear. The drop occurred at Windsor Castle, where a young Irish girl has been visiting. One evening, in order to pass the time away, the young Irish girl was asked by Mrs. Wettin to sing, which the same she did, singing to everybody's surprise and consternation, "The Wearing of the Green." According to the double-leaded scareheads and closely packed columns of the next morning's papers Mrs. Wettin wept over the song, and made a remark that no one knew of her sympathy for the Irish and the tenderness of her heart in that quarter. Just about that time a band of young Irish students in Dublin were going about with a banner on which was inscribed the fact that during Mrs. Wettin's time two million of the Irish had died of starvation. So, perhaps, Mrs. Wettin's depth of sympathy and tenderness of heart are a little malapropos.

CALIFORNIA'S ENGLISH

Some Facts and Features of Our British Residents.

Though there are something like 20,000 residents in the British colony of San Francisco, it is perhaps the colony that is least in evidence among those of our foreign populations. Only on occasions such as was brought about by the Queen's Jubilee is it heard and felt.

The reason for this is found no doubt in the fact that an English colony is not a thing segregated and apart. From a social point of view the Englishman in San Francisco does not regard himself otherwise than American. He associates as much with Americans as with his English compatriots, joins the American clubs, and to large degree adopts the American ways. There is no particular quarter of the city he affects for residence purposes, nor has there been any attempt at organization of the colony. Another thing to be taken into consideration in this connection is the fact that the English are one of the few peoples of the world who do not celebrate any national holiday. The French have their 14th of July, the Swiss their independence day, Ireland St. Patrick's, Scotland St. Andrew's day, and we of the States let the eagle scream on the glorious Fourth, but the Englishman has no national holiday, perhaps because he can never remember the time when he was not independent.

Financially, the prominent Englishmen of San Francisco are for the most part large merchants. Such was the character of the pioneer Britisher's business, and such it remained for a long time. There were at one period some half dozen merchant princes doing business in this city. Some of these firms still exist, and even those that have passed away are well remembered along Sansome and Front streets. Such were the houses of Falkner, Bell & Co., Dickson, de Wolf & Co., Daniel Gibbs, Cross & Co., S. L. Jones, Balfour-Guthrie and Hart Blair, who was the husband of Mrs. Yarde Buller, and who was drowned off the African coast.

In the early days all the better class of English business men in this city were in mercantile pursuits, but of late their occupation has changed its character somewhat, and to-day the tendency is towards banks, fire insurance and marine insurance and mining syndicates. The laboring class of Britishers in our city are almost entirely absorbed in mechanical pursuits, the Scotchman taking to machinery like an Italian to music. Though the English more closely resemble the Americans than any other foreigners they are precisely the ones who never quite amalgamate with us freely and without reserve. It does not take long to Americanize a German or a Swede. The Irishman governs us or tries to overthrow our government in six months. Germany, Scandinavia and Ireland become for them mere names, often even associated with a feeling of revulsion, but so long as an Englishman remains above ground, no matter what part of the world that ground may be, for just so long will he bewail his privation of "vegetable marrow," for just so long will he take off his hat to "God Save the Queen."

For a true Englishman never becomes merged into the people of his adopted race. He will mix freely with Americans, but he will never quite become one. In a foreign country he must do one of two things, either keep entirely and quietly to himself or else (if he can) get control and possession of the country from the native population, take charge of the government and run the show to suit himself. The Englishmen of San Francisco are slow to become naturalized—slower perhaps than any other Europeans saving the French. The clause in the naturalization papers relating to the renouncing of their allegiance "especially to Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Ireland," has perhaps a good deal to do with it. It is, in one way, rather fine that this should be so. One finds it rather admirable than otherwise. It is curious to note in this connection that Englishmen living in San Francisco choose to call themselves Californians rather than Americans. Just why this should be so it is hard to say. Perhaps it is for the same reason that led them to espouse the Southerners' cause in their States' rights difficulties of 1864.

The "younger son" element is not much in evidence among us. Some time ago there were a number of them to be seen at the clubs and at functions, where they set the fashions in waistcoats, taught the hunting set how to worm a foxhound or lay a drag, borrowed money and disappeared. They have not had many successors, and the most popular Englishmen in San Francisco to-day are those who are past middle age. In politics our English colony is intensely conservative, clinging obstinately to the approved order of things long established, suspicious of innovations and lovers of old customs, if there can be said to be any old customs in so new a city as this. With this in mind it is hardly necessary to name the ticket they vote. When they vote at all they are Republicans almost to a man.

THE JUBILEE AT HOME

How the Great Anniversary Was Celebrated in San Francisco.

The English residents of San Francisco celebrated the Jubilee in elaborate fashion by appropriate games, ceremonies and banquets. The games and ceremonies came off at the Chutes, while the banquet was held with all due observance in the main dining hall of the Palace Hotel. The gentlemen who were at the head of the Jubilee celebration or connected with it as speechmakers, toastmasters and the like are among the best known members of the English colony here. Mr. William Doxey was President of the General Committee, while heads of other committees were Wm. Greer Harrison, H. J. Stewart, James McNab and A. J. Callingham.

General Barnes, as the most brilliant public speaker of the coast, was chosen orator of the day, and delivered an eulogy, from which we make the following extracts:

The magnificent pageant which began this morning

GENERAL W. H. L. BARNES
Orator of the Celebration

under the meridian of Greenwich will culmiate with Tuesday's parade. The music of the martial airs of England will cease. That human ocean, lifting its living waves high above the pavements, foaming in every casement, rising above the roofs of the habitations of London, and hoarse with the loyal greetings, has at last ebbed.

The pealing of cannon, the chiming of bells, the march of civic societies, the cadenced step of soldiery, and the noisy trampling of artillery and cavalry will then be silenced, and a million witnesses of the jubilee ceremonies, full of rejoicing sympathy, gathered from every British possession and every friendly nation on earth, have been dispersed to palaces, luxurious abodes, to lowly homes.

But as the sun, which shone upon her as the vast procession threaded the streets of London, traveled from east to the zenith and from zenith to the west, over ocean, island and continent, his beams have illumined everywhere the same rejoicings and have beheld the same manifestations of loyalty repeated with equal enthusiasm and he will continue to hear the same strain chanting the Queen's glory until he has circled the entire globe.

The sixty years of Victoria's reign furnished an eloquent theme for the orator:

Our own republic has, during the same period, inaugurated thirteen Presidents, of whom few memories are preserved outside of national archives, national statutes, and national treaties, and even the names of some of them are not easily recollected by the average American, and by the world at large are utterly forgotten.

For all our great civilian Presidents, save Washington and Lincoln, there is absolutely no affectionate and personal remembrances deeply graven in the bosom of the people. The Father of His Country, and its great-hearted martyr, and its heroic general whose ashes repose in the stately mausoleum but just completed on the banks of the Hudson, are almost the sole though glorious exceptions to the rule that republics are ungrateful to and forgetful of those who have builded and died for them.

Not the least interesting passages of General Barnes' oration were those in which he expatiated on the respect and kindliness the Queen had ever shown to the United States. This sentiment was exhibited most conspicuously in the Trent affair during our civil war.

In the fall of 1861, when doubt and uncertainty clouded with perplexity and care the future of the Union, and its fate was hanging in the utmost suspense, the San Jacinto, a United States war steamer, arrested in mid-ocean the British mail steamer Trent and forcibly took from her Messrs. Mason and Slidell and their associates —four Southern citizens—on their way to England, charged by the Confederacy with a diplomatic function to the British government. The act was a gross violation of international law, extremely provoking, and, unless disavowed furnishing a solid cause of war and certainly calculated to arouse that sense of instinctive resentment which is natural to a proud and fighting race.

Many members of the English Cabinet were more than suspected of desiring to behold the disruption of the American Union. The Prime Minister was not slow to avail himself of this opportunity for armed intervention. He caused to be addressed to the British Minister resident at Washington a communication which roughly required the restoration to liberty and the return to the deck of the Trent the captured Confederate Commissioners, and with them an ample and humble apology.

His demand was coupled with and unmistakable threat of war in case of failure to comply with his demand. When the dispatch was forwarded to Her Majesty and examined by herself and the Prince Consort, it was totally disapproved. Its truculent language was eliminated, and the Prince, at the Queen's dictation, corrected and reframed Lord John Russell's dispatch so that it spoke in a gracious and kindly spirit, suggesting rather than demanding what was plainly right and just to be done by the United States and expressing the confident hope that the latter would at once see the propriety of immediate and full amends.

I need not say that the suggestion of the dispatch was gratefully accepted and promptly acted upon by President Lincoln.

VICTORIA REGINA IMPERATRIX.

O Woman whose annals can never be torn
From the record of England's renown;
How wisely and well in your day have you borne
The burdens of scepter and crown.
Your hand on the pulse of the people, you feel
The throb that responds to your own;
Their will is the will and their weal is the weal
Of the Commons, the Lords, and the Throne.
Evolved by the fates, and adjusted by time,
The poise of the Nation is true;
Its future is fixed, and its past is sublime,
And its glory is symboled in you.
Not the prowess of England, the might of her arms,
Wherever her flag is furled;
Wherever her flag is unfurled,
But the clang of her hammers, the tilth of her farms,
Have won her the marts of the world.
Your reign has been marked by the triumphs of peace,
Resplendent in letters and art;
O that war and the rumors of war may cease,
Is the cry of your woman's heart.
Type of all that is noblest in mother and wife,
We hail you, O Empress and Queen!
God save you! and grant that your autumn of life
Be peaceful, benign and serene.

—Lucius Harwood Foote.

group of ladies connected with the household of Queen Victoria has been entitled "The Princess of Wales and Her Sisters." This should read of course "The Duchess of York and Her Bridesmaids."

THE MARRIAGE PROBLEM

What Notable Women Say Upon the All-Important Subject.

Life, Death and Marriage, these three, and the greatest of these is marriage. For, after all, a man can make of his life much what he chooses, and when he's dead he's done for, and no more said, but when he gets married—that's the serious thing. Like the two vases floating in a cistern. It's all very well so long as they keep apart, but when they once come together and there's a smash, both break. Yet here are the opinions of some dozen or more women, clever women, of the sort who are supposed to know, who aver, that—but we'll take 'em one by one:

John Oliver Hobbes for the first. She is brief and to the point. (She sent her opinion by cable): "Men and women who are not bound by a religious vocation or by special circumstances should unquestionably marry," says she. Nothing undecisive about John Oliver.

Emma Thursby has an idea that early marriages even are to be preferred; says they are by far the happiest; says that it is not easy for those who have lived alone until middle life to adjust themselves to the changes involved. This expression, adjusting oneself to the changes involved, is grim with suggestion. "Changes involved!" One would rather say that there were changes involved. It is like being born again, making oneself over on a new scale. That's bad enough for most women and for all men, but if you don't adjust, it is worse.

Ella Wheeler Wilcox says that marriage means an earthly heaven or an earthly hell, and I fancy she has this "making over process" in mind. It's heaven if the process is successful, on both sides, and it's hell if it's not. Most heavens and hells, says she, are of our own making. Ella Wheeler Wilcox prefers remorse to regret, and then adds a saying so clever that I must quote it bodily: "Better try for happiness and be sorry for it than to go through life and be sorry you did not try." Ella Wheeler Wilcox says, "Marry, certainly." Starts out with that, and says it over again in a score of different ways, throughout some 800 words. She believes that love should accompany marriage, but she adds—and the thing rings strange—the ability to love and to win love can be cultivated by a proper attitude of mind, then suddenly she breaks sharply from this sober proper attitude of mind to cry out, "Love is the one thing worth thinking about in this breath of our existence."

She resorts direct to nature, does this Ella Wheeler Wilcox woman; she don't care a rap about conventions and practical things and radical issues. Love is the one thing worth while, and if you love each other you must marry because she reminds you that marriage is the universal law of nature, that bees marry the flowers, that trees entwine their roots under the sod, that the birds all go in pairs. This would be fine if life were more elemental, if it were a sort of Phyllis and Corydon arrangement with only the sheep to think of. But you see life means cities nowadays, with asphalt instead of hillsides. Phyllis and Corydon became a Mr. and Mrs. Somebody, liable for one another's debts, and instead of thinking of the sheep as sheep, they must must consider them as mutton chops and roasts.

Lillian Russell has an eye for this hardpan sort of thing, and Miss Russell knows the cities well—who better, in Heaven's name? She sounds the note of income at once with this. "The income that permits a young man of good social standing to live well, but just within its limits is not likely to permit two persons to do the same, especially if one is a woman. I should gather from Lillian's remarks that she does not put much faith in marriages, and surely Lillian is not speaking without experience. Only can the young man marry, according to her, unless he marries influence, money or so much brains that the woman's talent (the talent of an actress, probably) is sure to sweep him along to success.

She winds up with this:

"No man's success is so permanent that it may not be wrecked, however. If every young man deferred his marriage until he had a certificate from the Fates that he would never be anything but a success, Hymen would go into bankruptcy." Clara Barton is cautious, temporizes, cites the case of one man leaping from Brooklyn bridge in safety, and of the forty-nine who leap and are not safe. If marriage is such a leap as this one would prefer to stay safely on the bridge. But she has belief in common sense to such an extent that she claims "a well-founded, honest, accepted partnership should almost bid defiance to hard times and misfortune." This, I take it, has in mind the poor young couple, or say the poor young man who has no social position to keep up, who would have to make no great sacrifices because of a wife. But suppose the other case—the poor young man of the city who has a social position and who must live right up to his income to keep up appearances. This is the kind Mrs. Senator Frye has in mind, no doubt. She says: "To the question, can a young man of moderate earnings marry before his own future is assured: I should answer, Yes, provided he finds the right kind of wife. If he does, his future is assured." This is a good hearing, because a young man always thinks he has found just the right kind of wife. Mrs. Frye thinks it is most unfortunate for a young man to become a clubman. What he spends upon himself at the club will go far to help in the support of two, and Mrs. Frye believes that if he really cares for his wife the little economies he will be forced to practice after marriage will become a pleasure. "Yes," she says, in conclusion, "I should marry on a small salary and marry young."

Eva Wilder Brodhead shifts the responsibility of the matter upon Mrs. Humphrey Ward, citing the marriage of David Greive and Lucy as a case where a marriage by no means complete and perfect may in its results upon character ultimately fulfill a perfect and complete end and aim.

Marguerite Moore comes down to figures and states that a man about to marry ought to have a salary of $25 a week unless he intends to marry a domestic servant or other woman accustomed to hard work. "The chances of getting on," says Marguerite Moore, "are becoming slimmer every day, and in the case of a pinch it is the woman, the wife, who has the hardest part of the work."

Jeannette Gilder takes an opposite point of view. She says that a man can "get on" to-day just as easily as he could in his grandfather's time, and that whether he and his wife do "get on" or not rests largely in themselves. Every man and every woman, no matter what their circumstances, can marry and be happy if they choose, in Miss Gilder's mind, but it is the children question that makes the thing so serious, says she. No man has the right to bring children into the world that he cannot provide for, and of course she is quite right.

Mrs. John Sherman is somewhat outspoken in her views on the matter. If both the young man and the young woman are strong and healthy and able to support a family, they should, in Mrs. Sherman's opinion, marry at once. She does not discriminate in the least between the sexes in this affair. "If the woman be the better able," she says, "either mentally or physically, to sustain the burden of support let her take the helm and go forth to earn her bread, leaving her husband, to follow his special line of talent, whether it be domestic, artistic or poetic. Mrs. Sherman does not believe that the most important question relative to marriage is, "Can a man afford to marry?" but "Is he fitted to assume the responsibilities of a husband and a father?"

Mrs. Russell Alger has theories that are decisive enough to suit anybody, especially anybody who wants to get married. She married young, and she married poor, and she believes in marriage whether you are poor or not. "I married the General when I was only twenty and he twenty-four," says she. "He had a prosperous lumber business that was ruined by the war, and for a long time we had to practice the utmost economy, trusting to our love for one another. Marriage is a dual contract in which both parties must learn to bear and forbear, and is founded upon mutual respect. No trial is too difficult to bear when both are working together for the best interests of the family."

So all these prominent and clever women believe in the advisability of marriage for the poor young man, even though at the start of his career. I had intended at the first to offset and contradict all these female opinions with that of Mr. Kipling's, poetically expressed—the one that reads, "He travels the fastest who travels alone." But I've forgotten. He's married, so he don't count.

JUSTIN STURGIS.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The idea of Charles D. Lane betaking himself out of California on the very legs that the Democracy had intended to extend for the reception of W. J. Bryan suggests a suspicion that his gentle confidence in Democratic humanity has been tampered with. This would prove a calamity in certain quarters, but seems a reasonable assumption. Considering the ardor with which he has advanced the silver cause out of his pocket-book and the enthusiasm which was aroused in him by the news of the advent of Bryan, it is curious that he should refrain from assisting towards the entertainment of the Boy Orator. He must know that the purse of the party is light, yet he saddles it with this burden, when a few thousand from the Utica would have touched the occasion with glory. What is money to a man of his white metallic sentiment? A bagatelle. Either Mr. Lane has been informed that his generosity has earned him prominence not as a benefactor but rather as a "good thing," or he has been persuaded that other high lights of the party should be allowed to unbuckle their purses for the good of the cause. His letter, phrased so kindly, exuding rich wishes and gentle words, is not a document on which money can be raised unfortunately, and, coming in lieu of a check, was a most delightful piece of irony. However, Bryan must be entertained, and it has been suggested that Louis Metzger, the distinguished Democrat who has been appointed to the Executive Committee, might manage to bridge the difficulty with a special drawing of the Little Louisiana Lottery Company. The town is ever ready for a gamble, and I can readily believe that two such laudable objects as the entertainment of a coming man and the prospect of personal enrichment would prove most attractive, and besides, would relieve the drooped spirits of the committee.

What form of romance is comparable with the sudden acquirement of wealth? We all must live, and to live requires bed and board, which are only had by virtue of dollars. Even in our heroes, we demand an eye to the main chance, because experience demonstrates that the path of him who has no money, however fearless he be, is thorny indeed. What matters the winning of a Victoria Cross, if the owner is driven to pawn the decoration by lack of bread? Mere valor, intelligence, integrity, or learning are nothing save mediums for making money—special equipments for wresting coin from a tight-fisted world. In California, nowadays, one hears seldom of fortunes built up by business operations, but, at frequent intervals, one is told of the discovery of a mine which nets men millions. Money so easily gained often takes flight with equal facility, but many of the wealthy folk who live in fine houses along the residence streets of San Francisco, and whose income is derived no one knows whence or where, owe their gold to the sudden development of a prospect. Here, by way of illustration, is the story of a young man named Deedart, who, at 17 years of age, was given a place by his uncle Dr. Zeille, in the rich mine which that worthy capitalist owned in conjunction with the late Lawyer Heydenfeldt. Deedart was in as a bookkeeper, and watching the operations of the institution, started to study mining scientifically. He read all the books, worked out the various experiments at first hand, and learned about leads, ledges, and the operation of drifts on the Mother Lode. Besides, he saved his salary. A better place to obtain a real knowledge of mining could hardly be found. In prospecting he came across a property—the Argonaut—a good sized claim adjoining the famous Kennedy, which has made millionaires of several plain citizens. The surface indications pointed to a rich ore deposit, at least as good as its neighbors, and, just at this time there being little excitement about mines, Deedart, at a small outlay, bonded the place, and subsequently organized a small company to develop it. He retained for himself the controlling interest in the corporation, and every cent he could raise went into the shaft. They are down now twelve hundred feet and have exposed six hundred feet of a fourteen-foot ledge, the rock from which mills $30 per ton. Indeed, next to the Gwin, the Argonaut is to-day the most promising mine north of the Tuolumne. What is more, it has been found that the Kennedy, in its operations, had, unwittingly, I suppose, encroached some forty-two feet on its land between the 1,200 and 1,800 foot levels, and a big suit is now pending in the courts thereon. This won, Deedart will begin reaping the profits of his industry with a substatial share of the Kennedy's gold. The Argonaut mine is worth a million at least, so here you have a bookkeeper aged now about thirty-eight, who has never had aught but his salary, and who has pinched himself his days through to obtain dollars for his venture, a very wealthy man with the world before him and relieved of the cares of necessity for the rest of his days. Besides, he is equipped with a working knowledge of mining that cannot fail to add to his riches.

Never was there such activity in mining as to-day. From the Rawhide to the Tuolumne river every inch of country is claimed, and under development, making a solid mining belt of five miles in length. Indeed, it is just now the only prosperous region in the State, and I believe we are but at the inception of its possibilities. In the meantime, the condition of the real estate in San Francisco is the reverse of satisfactory. I am told that two of the most successful money lenders in town, Louis Metzger and Judah Boas, have recently offered, through a prominent real estate agency, their realty holdings at 60 per cent. of what the properties cost them. Considering the shrewdness with which these men conduct their business, this step seems a radical one, but one hears all around similar stories. The Hibernia Bank is rapidly foreclosing all its more hopeless mortgages, and this bank property can now be had for 80 per cent. of the assessed value. Indeed, under the influence of the depression, the increase of the last fifteen years has vanished. Though this bears the characteristics of calamity to some minds, it must seem to the thinking man the best possible treatment for the very worst of our local evils. For the last decade the favorite form of investment in San Francisco has been real estate. Whenever a man had money to spare he bought houses and lands. The idea of putting their surplus funds into a business, of developing with them some new industry, never occurred to our capitalists. If they did not care for realty there were savings banks galore to take their coin and pay 4 per cent. for the use of it. But these times have changed. Our millionaires must retire from the role of money lender and find some productive investment if they would have an income from their hordes. They must develop and devise, and instead of letting the East supply our local needs, must undertake dealing with them at first hands. There are mines to exploit and forests to convert into lumber—indeed, a thousand enterprises which, under intelligent direction, might be made to yield profit, not only to individuals, but to add materially to the wealth of the Coast. In the meantime, almost any one can get a home, for prices are quite low enough to put property within the reach of poor men.

They have it on California street that Claus Spreckels proposes to open a commercial bank on the first floor of the Spreckels Building. The "Call" is to have its own quarters in an adjoining structure, and the tall white tower will be consecrated to finance. No one in town has so much coin to loan as the Sugar King, whose immense income is far beyond his capacity to invest. If he obtains the services of competent bankers—and certainly he never does things by halves—there is no reason to doubt but that he could build up a big institution. It is said, too, and I give the report for what it is worth, that the Spreckels are quite ready to convert the annexation of the Islands to good and profitable advantage, should it be accomplished. A great colonization scheme has been formulated which would bring to the new territory a splendid class of European immigrants, and I am told the arrangements have gone far enough to ensure results. Of course annexation would be the making of the Oceanic Steamship Company, and the other interests of the Sugar King would benefit in proportion. However, he is in opposition, and he is a strong opponent.

If "Doomed" has not been heralded as the most remarkable story of San Francisco ever published we might have accepted it as a fitting contribution to Sunday supplement literature, but the announcement, like the booming of poor Mary Mannering, made us all unduly expectant and actually persuaded me to read what I should otherwise have looked at. In the first place, and with due respect to the editor of the "Examiner," "Doomed" is not a story at all. It is by no means the most marvelous article about San Francisco ever written. That is rather a bold claim, and not to be put forth without due consideration. Let the Sunday Editor be less audacious in his announcements. Otherwise, last week's was the smartest "Sup" the Monarch has issued since the colored press began its ruthless raid on space. The interviews with the Prince of Savoy and Adgie were good features.

Apropos of newspaper work, Miss Mabel Craft is entitled to credit for her clever and entertaining reports of the Fair case in the "Chronicle." It is no easy task converting the dry details of the day's proceedings into the gay and breezy sketches that confront one at one's morning coffee. How difficult it is may be realized by comparing these articles with the stereotyped statements of essential details which form the staple trial report. During the year Miss Craft has decidedly come to the front, and the fact that she is pitted against the "Examiner's" stars, Ed. Hamilton and Cahill, shows the strides she has made in her profession.

BOSWELL JR.

AN ARK DINING-ROOM

SOME PROMINENT BUILDINGS IN THE TOWN OF ARKS

IMITATORS OF NOAH

How the Resident of the House-Boat Enjoys Life on the Water.

I know some people who have solved the problem of having a maximum good time at a minimum expense, and they live in house-boats or "arks" over at Belvedere. The writer passed two days in one of these arks last week, and if he lives and does well he hopes some day that he will have an ark all of his own, and pass two months of every summer in the same. It is hard to say just wherein lies the charm of ark life. At first thought or glance one would believe that the inhabitants would be something too much cabined, cribbed, confined—that there would be no walks to take, no rides nor drives—that space would be wanting in which to swing the proverbial cat, and in a measure all this is true. Cabined you certainly are. Only one man, we believe, ever succeeded in walking on the water, and he's drowned, and the swung cat is a sensation that must be experienced to be enjoyed. But in a week's time the house-boat man "adapts himself to his environment" (we did it in two days—even less), and when he has done that and got into the spirit of the thing, he begins to see that there are other things in life besides mere walking and driving, and that the habit of swinging cats can be outgrown. Note what are some of these "other things": The pleasures of boating combined with the "comforts" of home, sea air that is better than champagne, a cool plunge bath at your threshold, with fresh water every hour of the day; fishing that is a relaxation, not an exertion (the fish are caught while you wait and can be cooked as soon as caught); an entire change of scenery out of the window four times a day, as the boat swings with the tide; neighbors a-plenty; idleness of the monumental sort; and last of all, but merely a detail, of course — a trivial advantage that only the sordid bourgeois would appreciate — absolute and complete immunity from ground-rent, taxes, insurance, repairs, and all the rest of the expenses that are connected with residence in a town house.

One of the first novelties you experience when you go aboard an ark to take up your residence is the confusion of ideas suggested by this floating house. You sit down to table and you feel as though you were in any well-appointed dining-room of the Western Addition. There is nothing suggestive of a yacht or boat of any description; in five minutes you have forgotten that you are on a boat, then suddenly the hanging-lamp sways gently, and the water in the goblets (or say wine, if you like) shifts its level and the floor and whole room careens slightly and settles to its place again. It is really very curious, especially if, as the writer did, you have quite forgotten about the nautical character of the thing, when that boat heaves under you, you think at once of earthquakes or the "haunted swing," or else you clutch wildly but furtively at the table-ledge with sudden suspicion as to the strength and headiness of your host's wine. Then he tells you that it is only the swells of the seven o'clock boat, and you remember where you are.

It is sometime before you can reconcile these conflicting sensations of house-boating and ark life, because when you remember the house part of the ark you forget the boat, and when you get used to the boat you forget the house. For instance, when we got up and were dressing the next morning, looking out of the window the whiles, and listening to the cluck-clucking of the water along the sides, we couldn't get back to the "house" part of the scheme at all, and found ourselves wondering how long this blamed boat was going to stop out here in mid-stream. And when you come to that you are not cribbed nor confined after all, any more than is the Venetian. Every ark has its little following of row boats nuzzling at its flanks, and the shore is but a half dozen strokes away. Many of the arks, too, have their naphtha launches. These last are, of course, merely for the fun of chasing up and down the bay in the near neighborhood, visiting from ark to ark, or going after the mail and the like, but it is very amusing to notice how this system of ark life has impressed itself upon the shore-living tradespeople. The butcher, the baker, the laundryman and the grocer each has his launch or boat, and goes the round of the arks twice a day, just as his brothers in the city call with their delivery-wagons. Some of the arks even have a telephone wire laid to shore, and it wouldn't be surprising if next season saw a system of electric lights established on these stationary boats. Not altogether stationary, however. In the winter season, when the railroad bridge is lifted, the arks are towed over to their winter quarters on the other side of the bay, and are laid up till the following summer.

What makes the whole affair so interesting is that it is so unique. Nowhere else, save perhaps in the rivers of China, has one ever heard of this custom of living in arks. The thing has become so popular that the number increases every year, and some day, perhaps, they will have to be laid out in rows and blocks at right angles and the streets, or rather waterways, named, and bridges thrown across here and there, and a miniature Venice created. But think of the confusion in the very unlikely event of a gale of wind, or if one of the arks should slip its moorings and go careening riotously off with the outgoing tide!

One of the most original, as well as one of the most comfortable arks at Belvedere is Mr. Habenicht's "Nautilus.' It has been built of four street cars placed end on two and two and the partitions removed. It is surprising what a delightful pair of rooms such a combination brings into existence—plenty of light on all sides, a couple of sliding doors at both ends, lamps built into the wall, ventilators a plenty and a long bench flanking the walls. But where else, on what other waters of the world than this bay of ours, would you find such an anomaly, four street cars built as a boat and used as a house?

LOOKING DOWN THE WATER-WAY

Little Dramas of the Curbstone

BY FRANK NORRIS

The first Little Drama had for backing the red brick wall of the clinic at the Medical Hospital, and the calcium light was the feeble glimmer of a new-lighted street lamp, though it was yet early in the evening and quite light. There were occasional sudden explosions of a northeast wind at the street corners, and at long intervals an empty cable-car trundled heavily past with a strident whirring of jostled glass windows. Nobody was in sight—the street was deserted. There was the pale red wall of the clinic, severe as that of a prison, the livid gray of the cement sidewalk, and above the faint greenish blue of a windy sky. A door in the wall of the hospital opened, and a woman and a young boy came out. They were dressed darkly, and at once their two black figures detached themselves violently against the pale blue of the background. They made the picture. All the faint tones of the wall and the sky and the gray-brown sidewalk focused immediately upon them. They came across the street to the corner upon which I stood, and the woman asked a direction. She was an old woman, and poorly dressed. The boy, I could see, was her son. Him I took notice of, for she led him to the steps of the nearest house and made him sit down upon the lowest one. She guided all his movements, and he seemed to be a mere figure of wax in her hands. She stood over him, looking at him critically, and muttering to herself. Then she turned to me, and her muttering rose to a shrill, articulate plaint:

"Ah, these fool doctors—these dirty beasts of medical students! They impose upon us because we're poor, and rob us and tell us lies."

Upon this I asked her what her grievance was, but she would not answer definitely, putting her chin in the air and nodding with half-shut eyes, as if she could say a lot about that if she chose.

"Your son is sick?" said I.

"Yes—or no—not sick; but he's blind, and—and—he's blind and he's an idiot—born that way—blind and idiot."

Blind and an idiot! Blind and an idiot! Will you think of that for a moment, you with your full stomachs, you with your brains, you with your two sound eyes. Born blind and idiotic! Do you fancy the horror of that thing? Perhaps you cannot, nor perhaps could I myself have conceived of what it meant to be blind and an idiot had I not seen that woman's son in front of the clinic, in the empty, windy street, where nothing stirred, and where there was nothing green. I looked at him as he sat there, tall, narrow, misshapen. His ready-made suit, seldom worn, but put on that day because of the weekly visit to the clinic, hung in stupid wrinkles and folds upon him. His cheap felt hat, clapped upon his head by his mother with as little unconcern as an extinguisher upon a candle, was wrong end foremost, so that the bow of the band came upon the right hand side. His hands were huge and white, and lay open and palm upward at his side, the fingers inertly lax, like those of a discarded glove, and his face——

When I looked at the face of him I know not what insane desire, born of an unconquerable disgust, came up in me to rush upon him and club him down to the pavement with my stick and batter in that face—that face of a blind idiot—and blot it out from the sight of the sun for good and all. It was impossible to feel pity for the wretch. I hated him because he was blind and an idiot. His eyes were filmy, like those of a fish, and he never blinked them. His mouth was wide open.

Blind and an idiot; absolute stagnation; life as unconscious as that of the jelly-fish; an excrescence; a parasitic fungus in the form of a man; a creature far below the brute. The last horror of the business was that he never moved; he sat there just as his mother had placed him, his motionless, filmy eyes fixed, his jaw dropped, his hands opened at his sides, his hat on wrong side foremost. He would sit like that, I knew, for hours—for days, perhaps—would, if left to himself, die of starvation, without raising a finger. What was going on inside of that misshapen head—behind those fixed eyes?

I had remembered the case by now. One of the students had told me of it. His mother brought him to the clinic occasionally, so that the lecturer might experiment upon his brain, stimulating it with electricity. "Heredity," the student had commented; "father a degenerate; exhausted race; drank himself into a sanitarium."

While I was thinking all this the mother of the boy had gone on talking, her thin voice vibrarant with complaining and vituperation. But indeed I could bear with it no longer, and went away. I left them behind me in the deserted, darkening street the querulous, nagging woman and her blind, idiotic boy, and the last impression I have of the scene was her shrill voice ringing after me the oft-repeated words:

"Ah, the dirty beasts of doctors—they robs us and impose on us and tell us lies because we're poor!"

* * * * * * *

The second Little Drama was wrought out for me the next day. I was sitting in the bay window of the club watching the world go by, when my eye was caught by a little group on the curbstone directly opposite. An old woman, meanly dressed, and two little children, both girls, the eldest about ten, the yougest, say, six or seven. They had been coming slowly along, and the old woman had been leading the youngest child by the hand. Just as they came opposite to where I was sitting the younger child lurched away from the woman once or twice, dragging limply at her hand, then its knees wobbled and bent and the next moment it had collapsed upon the pavement. Some children will do this from sheer perversity and with intent to be carried. But it was not perversity on this child's part. The poor old woman hauled the little girl up to her feet, but she collapsed again at once after a couple of steps, and sat helplessly down upon the sidewalk, staring vaguely about, her thumb in her mouth. There was something wrong with the little child—one could see that at half a glance. Some complaint, some disease of the muscles, some weakness of the joints, that smote upon her like this at inopportune moments. Again and again her old mother, with very painful exertion—she was old and weak herself—raised her to her feet, only that she might sink in a heap before she had moved a yard. The old woman's bonnet fell off—a wretched, battered black bonnet, and the other little girl picked it up and held it while she looked on at her mother's efforts with an indifference that could only have been born of familiarity. Twice the old woman tried to carry the little girl, but her strength was not equal to it; indeed, the effort of raising the heavy child to its feet was exhausting her. She looked helplessly at the street cars as they passed, but you could see she had not enough money to pay even three fares. Once more she set her little girl upon her feet, and helped her forward half a dozen steps. And so, little by little, with many pauses for rest and breath, the little group went down the street and passed out of view, the little child staggering and falling as if from drunkenness, her sister looking on gravely, holding the mother's battered bonnet, and the mother herself, patient, half-exhausted, her gray hair blowing about her face, laboring on step by step, trying to appear indifferent to the crowd that passed by on either side, trying bravely to make light of the whole matter until she should reach home. As I watched them I thought of this woman's husband, the father of this paralytic little girl, and somehow it was brought to me that none of them would ever see him again, but that he was alive for all that.

* * * * * * *

The third Little Drama was lively, and there was action in it, and speech, and a curious, baffling mystery. On a corner near a certain bank in this city there is affixed to the lamp post a call-box that the police use to ring up for the patrol wagon. When an arrest is made in the neighborhood the offender is brought here, the wagon called for, and he is conveyed to the City Prison. On the afternoon of the day of the second Little Drama, as I came near to this corner, I was aware of a crowd gathered about the lamp post that held the call-box, and between the people's heads and over their shoulders I could see the blue helmets of a couple of officers. I stopped and pushed up into the inner circle of the crowd. The two officers had in custody a young fellow of some eighteen or nineteen years. And I was surprised to find that he was as well dressed and as fine looking a lad as one would wish to see. I did not know what the charge was—I don't know it now; but the boy did not seem capable of any great meanness. As I got into the midst of the crowd, and while I was noting what was going forward, it struck me that the people about me were unusually silent—silent as people are who are interested and unusually observant. Then I saw why. The young fellow's mother was there, and the Little Drama was enacting itself between her, her son, and the officers who had him in charge. One of these later had the key to the call-box in his hand. He had not yet rung for the wagon. An altercation was going on between the mother and the son—she entreating him to come home, he steadily refusing.

"It's up to you," said one of the officers, at length; "if you don't go home with your mother, I'll call the wagon."

"No!"

"Jimmy!" said the woman, and then, coming close to him, she spoke to him in a low voice and with an earnestness, an intensity, that it hurt one to see.

"No!"

"For the last time, will you come?"

"No! No! No!"

The officer faced about and put the key into the box, but the woman caught at his wrist and drew it away, It was a veritable situation. It should have occurred behind footlights and in the midst of painted flats and flies, but instead the city thundered about it, drays and cars went up and down in the street, and the people on the opposite walk passed with but an instant's glance. The crowd was as still as an audience, watching what next would happen. The crisis of the Little Drama had arrived.

"For the last time, will you come with me?"

"No!"

She let fall her hand then and turned and went away, crying into her handkerchief. The officer unlocked and opened the box, set the indicator and opened the switch. A few moments later, as I went on up the street, I met the patrol-wagon coming up on a gallop.

What was the trouble here? Why had that young fellow preferred going to prison rather than home with his mother? What was behind it all I shall never know. It was a mystery—a little eddy in the tide of the city's life, come and gone in an instant, yet reaching down to the very depths of those things that are not meant to be seen.

And as I went along I wondered where was the father of that young fellow who was to spend his first night in jail, and the father of the little paralytic girl, and the father of the blind idiot, and it seemed to me that the chief actors in these three Little Dramas of the Curbstone had been somehow left out of the programme.

When the Queen recently performed the ceremony of opening the fine new Town Hall at Sheffield, 50,000 children were gathered together in Nolfolk Park to sing on her arrival there, each child being furnished with a programme, varied in color, so that on the paper being waved at a given signal a gigantic Union Jack was simulated. For these little ones the Duke of Norfolk, Mayor of the city, provided tea, in connection with which the following story is related: The Duke sampled the buns to be given to the children and said they were too plain. The baker said they were the best he could do for the money, a penny each. "Then stick another half-penny on and put more currants in," said the Duke. The baker opined that if the buns were too rich they might be bad for the children. "Oh, no," replied the Duke, "when I was a child, I never thought anything of a bun unless it made me feel bad."

Henry Labouchere's bias in Transvaal matters is pretty well understood, and, notwithstanding that the value of his advice has been considerably discounted by his prejudiced and intemperate course of procedure as a member of the investigating committee in connection with the Jameson raid, he continues to devote columns of "Truth" to advising both British and Boer governments as to their proper course of action now and in the future. In a recent article he remarks that most of the English "would at once leave were the gold mines to pan-out." We should have supposed that this sapient cosmopolitan editor would know the meaning of the term "pan-out," which he uses to convey the opposite of what it really signifies. An American miner would say "peter-out" in the premises.

IN SOCIETY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

Over at San Rafael the paper chase is the one great topic. The first meet of the Hunt Club takes place on Saturday afternoon and there will be a goodly gathering of maids, matrons and men to follow the scent. Frank Johnson promises an easy course, with nothing dangerous in the way of fences or ditches, and every one who can ride is exhorted to get a horse and go after the hounds. There are to be twelve hunts this summer, and a dozen silver cups have been subscribed to reward the winners. Quite a number of the sojourners at the Rafael have announced themselves as candidates for the prizes, and if only the newspapers will keep their hands off and avoid guying the participants there is little doubt that the chases will enjoy great popularity. After the hunt there is to be a ball at the Rafael to-night, which should prove a jolly affair. Invitations to the number of several hundred have been sent out, and there will be a large gathering of young people from Ross Valley, San Rafael proper and its environment. On Saturday night last the charmed circle around the big fireplace in the hall was rather broken into by an impromptu musical performance gotten up by Mr. Fries. Howard Taylor sang and was followed by Miss Della Mills, who has a fine voice and who rendered admirably several pretty songs. Subsequently, Miss Finnegan gave several pretty morceaux in French, and altogether the evening passed quite brilliantly.

There is more real gaiety and movement at San Mateo than at any of the suburban resorts. A number of congenial people are householders there, and in their circle there is a continual interchange of hospitalities that make the time pass very quickly. Not a night passes without it yielding amusement in the form of cards or a Welsh rarebit party or music or some other diverting and agreeable form of entertainment. Among the residents there are the Doutys, Fords, A. S. Baldwins, C. B. Stones, Schwerins, Greens and Bates. The members of this coterie succeed in thoroughly enjoying themselves, for, after all, it is congenial people that make a summer pleasant anywhere.

There was the usual gathering at the clubhouse at Burlingame on Sunday, and it was beguiled with music, which is the latest innovation and promises to be popular. Not that the people who go down there are denied music in other ways, but there is something festive about a band which helps out the holiday effect. There is polo as usual on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons.

Among the sojourners at Burlingame a prayer goeth up nightly that building operations there may soon be terminated. The half dozen villas in course of erection fill the air with raucus noises. However, most of them are on the verge of completion, and the happy owners are preparing to move in. Mrs. Will Crocker talks of additions to her pretty home, as it has not proved large enough for all the visitors she desires to entertain. Colonel Crocker is making himself comfortable in his new house, and is erecting on the Howard place a commodious stable after a design in harmony with the present structure.

Monday being the opening night of the Lyceum Company, and of "Shenandoah" at the Columbia, the theaters attracted quite a number of people from the country. At both shows there were scores of parties. The McBeans, Carrols, Tobins and Houmans had parties. The Hagers came over from San Rafael to see "Shenandoah."

Lawn tennis is decidedly in the ascendant. It has again become a subject of conversation in polite society, and one hears the form of the different aspirants discussed with animation and details over the tea tables of San Rafael and Oakland. The annual tournament at the courts of the Rafael is anticipated with the greatest interest. It is to begin Friday, July 2d, and will continue through the 3d and 5th, and is to be conducted under the auspices of the U. S. National Lawn Tennis Association. For the winner of the Allcomers there is a handsome prize, valued at one hundred dollars. The second is also to have a prize, and there is to be a consolation cup for the third man. A handsome silver cup has been selected for the match between the winner of the Allcomers and the present champion, Mr. Hardy, which becomes the personal property of the winner after its third capture. Walter Magee acts as referee, and George Whitney, Sumner Hardy and George Bradshaw are the committee in charge.

In the Sierras it is indeed summer. The sky is clear and free from all traces of the pernicious sea fog that hangeth around San Francisco, and incidentally keeps us comfortably cool. But nowhere is the air more delightful than at Deer Park Inn, up near Lake Tahoe. Quite a number of interesting people are sojourning there for the summer, among others, Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd Osbourne and their family, who propose staying until October. Accompanying them is Miss Marjorie Ide, the third of the beautiful daughters of Chief Justice Ide of Samoa. Among those who are to be there during the season are Mr. and Mrs. Horace Hill, who have taken for their family the log cottage "Tamarack." Judge and Mrs. Van R. Paterson will occupy Sierra Cottage during July and August, and the "Forty-Nine" cottage will be occupied by Mr. and Mrs. E. R. Taylor. Mr. and Mrs. George A. Rankin and many others are also sojourning there.

An interesting engagement recently announced is that of Miss Annie Lawlor and Mr. Walter Wells. Miss Lawlor, who is quite a fascinating and decidedly pretty girl, is a daughter of Dr. and Mrs. Lawlor of San Quentin. She is a favorite member of the younger set. Mr. Wells is a son of the late owner of the San Francisco Laundry, and is one of the managers of that institution. He is a bright, competent young business man with a future.

On Wednesday Joseph D. Grant and Miss Edith Macleay were married at the First Presbyterian Church in Portland. It was a very simple affair, only relatives and special friends being present. The bride had her sister, Miss Mabel Macleay, as maid of honor, and Roderick Macleay, her brother, acted as best man for the groom. Contrary to expectations, Mr. Grant had none of his friends from town to see him through the ordeal, but his father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. Adam Grant, were there to do the occasion honor. The newly wedded twain set out almost immediately after the ceremony for Europe, where their honeymoon will be spent. I am told that the presents were very gorgeous indeed, including all sorts of silverware and jewelry. Considering that there are millions on both sides of the union this is not extraordinary.

Undoubtedly the marriage of Miss Koshland and Emil Greenbaum would have been converted into a function but for the recent death of the bride's father. Both are well known in society, Miss Koshland being reckoned quite the brightest member of her set, an exceedingly witty conversationalist, and possessed of literary skill and intelligence. She is a daughter of the late Simon Koshland, the well-known capitalist. Mr. Greenbaum is associated with the King-Morse Canning Company, and is a very accomplished and intelligent man. The ceremony was performed by Dr. Voorsanger at the home of the bride's mother, 1808 Pine street. Miss Koshland wore a handsome gown of corded silk, draped with point lace.

The summer at Oakland is being broken into by weddings. Quite a variety of these interesting events have occurred to relieve the tedium of existence there. Lunch-giving and dinner-giving are, for the time being, obsolete forms of entertainment. The high lights of the haute monde across the bay are in the mountains or in the secluded valleys of the interior, or maybe by the seaside, resting the rest of the just, the tired and the rich. Nowadays one must be rich to rest.

As for the weddings, first and chiefest was that of Miss Jessie Coleman and Mr. Knowles on Wednesday last. The ceremony was celebrated with due rejoicing but with no flare. There was music with feasting subsequently, set forth with decorations and other insignia of a great matrimonial entertainment. But tout Oakland was by no means invited. It was rather a family affair, about seventy-five men and maids being present, and there was ample room for all of them in the Coleman house. Miss Donaldson, who had come out from Philadelphia, was maid of honor. After the honeymoon the happy pair are to settle down to married life, with its cares and comforts, or trials and tribulations, whichever it may be, in a comfortable villa on Oak street, which they have taken for the winter. The wedding presents are rich and numerous, and include innumerable silverware from the Knowles family.

Here you have the wedding of prime importance—union of wealthy and prominent families—popular girl and man with innumerable friends. All their circumstances conduce to comfort and their dispositions to happiness, so what more is there left to desire. Next let us record the nuptials of Miss Esther Needham and Mr. Mering, a Woodland merchant. Miss Needham has won a meed of favor with her voice and is a member of the First Methodist choir, where the ceremony was performed on Wednesday last. Decorations of pink daisies set off the pretty white organdie of the bride's gown. Six pretty girls dressed in snowy white and wearing big picture hats performed the function of ushers. There was good music, subsequently a reception, followed by rice and slippers, for the wedded twain.

Another marriage which united business and song was that of Mrs. Olive Reed and Mr. Cushman. Mrs. Reed's name is familiar to concert-goers, for she possesses a fine soprano organ which is often heard in public. Her husband is in the employ of the Valley Railroad Company. They were wedded in Mrs. Reed's home on Filbert street, to the accompaniment of some very good music, towards which Andrew Bogart and Dr. Graham contributed. They are to live on Octavia street, San Francisco, so Oakland loses another sweet singer.

As the season advances so Oaklanders scatter further to the north and south in a wild search either for change or pastures new. The Whitneys are in Mill Valley, where they have leased a villa for the summer; the Hutchinsons are in Sonoma; the Folgers are at San Rafael; Mrs. Henry Vrooman and her daughters have gone to their Santa Rosa Ranch. In the fall Miss Beatrice Vrooman goes to Smith College and Miss Mary to the Boston School of Technology.

DRAMATIC NOTES

San Francisco knows Ed. Stevens, light opera comedian, and San Francisco likes him. He was a good enough Stevens for San Francisco as he was. It is not necessary that he should Hopperize himself to add to his popularity here. We know what Hopper's idea of "Wang" is, and we have given our approval. We would like to know what Stevens' idea of the same bluffing, cowardly, pretentious scoundrel may be. But our beloved Edwin refuses to divulge his notion and insists on our taking Hopper filtered through Stevens. The result, of course, is not displeasing, very far from it. But one cannot help wishing that Stevens were a bit more self-confident and always looked at things through his own eyes.

The entire production at the Tivoli is worthy. There is not a distinctly poor soloist, and the chorus, especially the male portion, is unusually excellent. The happy jingles and the elaborate jokes have been again received by San Francisco with all the cordiality of old friends. And again we pause to remark that not in any other city in the broad United States can so well staged and well sung opera be seen for so little money.

Maud Edna Hall has some very emotional work as Madeline Ashley in "The Man from the South" at Morosco's. She enacts the daughter of a gentleman gambler, who, after marrying the man she loves, discovers that her first husband, whom she had left at the altar and considers dead, very much alive. Everything turns out well in the last act, but in the interim there is trouble for almost everyone. Mortimer Snow is a heroic and manly young hero. John J. Pierson is calmly disagreeable as the recalcitrant husband, and Sanders Stevens makes a good character of Madeline's gaming but finally repentant father. Lorena Atwood is again cast as the lady villain, and is quite clever in her wickedness. Virginia Jackson, the new soubrette, is a pretty young woman. She is capable and well dressed, but her "cuteness" is altogether too vigorous to be agreeably acceptable.

Lew Dockstader is the soul of the show at the Orpheum, and for forty full minutes holds the stage and the audience along with it. His political speech is inimitable and his topical songs the most humorous heard heard here in many a day. Caron and Herbert are clever acrobats, clever out of the ordinary, and amusing in their comedy; but like many others they carry it a little too far. Alexander Hiendl, with his 'cello, charms the audience and receives enthusiastic encores for "Ben Bolt" and the intermezzo from "Cavalleria Rusticana," both of which he plays in an artistic manner.

A very striking feature of "A Social Highwayman," to be given its initial production in this city at the Columbia next week, is the spiritualistic scene, a startling and novel combination that was one of the sensations when the play was seen in New York. The piece is a dramatization by Mary T. Stone of Elizabeth Phipps Train's story, and was originally produced at the Garrick Theater, New York, by E. M. and Joseph Holland. The play gained favor at once and soon became one of the successes of the season. The Frawley Company is very likely to give the piece a satisfactory production

One of the very best costume plays of the period is "The First Gentleman of Europe," which is to be presented by the Lyceum Company at the Baldwin next Monday evening. It is the collaborated work of Mrs. Hodgson Burnett and Miss Constance Fletcher, a young novelist, better known as George Fleming. The Regent was hardly an admirable character, but in the play he is connected with an object of sympathy. James K. Hackett will be the Prince of Wales and Mary Mannering Daphene Oldfield, the daughter of an impecunious goldsmith.

Another play of the South will be staged at Morosco's next week in "Blue Grass," a romance of Kentucky. The scenery and effects are to be unusually elaborate and the cast, headed by Maud Hall, takes in the entire company.

The tenth anniversary of the opening of the Orpheum will be observed Wednesday evening, and souvenirs commemorative of the event will be distributed. The new people that go on next week are Smith and Fuller, bamboo bell players, whose act is said to be novel. Lew Dockstader continues, also Caron and Herbert, Alexander Heindl, Canfield and Carleton, Russell Brothers and Josephine Sabel.

Boucicault's two-act comedy, "Andy Blake" will be the attraction at the Alcazar next week, in addition to "The First Born," which begins its eighth week. Miss May Buckley will be seen as Andy, a boy's part, and will bring in a few specialties. On Thursday afternoon, July 1st, there will be a professional matinee performance of "The First Born." Frank Carlyle, Miss Selene Johnson and George Trader are under contract to the Alcazar and are now en route from the East to open after the run of the Chinese play.

"Wang" will go on for another week at the Tivoli. The production to follow will be the first presentation in this city of the comic opera "The Isle of Champagne," written by Charles Alfred Byrne and Louis Harrison, with music by W. W. Furst.

Oakland has developed quite a number of aspiring playwrights. In the contest inaugurated by Manager T. D. Bates there were over thirty contestants. Mr. Raymond Buss was awarded first prize, Mr. Henry S. Kirk second, and Miss Elizabeth C. Bunner third.

An Arkansas lawyer, who was a native of North Carolina, wanted to inform a juror, also a native of North Carolina, that they both hailed from the same State. So he dropped some chewing gum, stepped upon it, and pretended that his heel had stuck to the floor. This gave him an opportunity to say that he was a "tar heel" and that warmth of the room had made the tar run. The verdict proved that the tar heels stuck together.

THE MONTH'S FICTION

The Editor and His Wife Talk Over the Latest Books.

The Editor prefers to have it believed that his mind has soared beyond fiction. He imagines an acquaintance with the latest novel bespeaks a frivolity of intellect which agrees ill with his high professions. Yet the habit of years is strong on him and his wife, who devours the volumes that come to the office, finds her husband equipped with views which he could only have gathered from the books themselves.

"It's too bad you are so busy," murmured the Editor's wife, as they sat over their coffee and raisins after dinner.

"Why, my dear," he replied.

"It would amuse you so much to read 'Soldiers of Fortune,' the new book of Richard Harding Davis. I began it this morning after breakfast, and knew nothing until Hope and Clay were well on the way to New York to be married. Then I felt hungry and found it an hour after lunch time. There's fascination for you."

"I've dipped into the book," the Editor admitted, rather reluctantly. "As stories go, it is a cleverly managed tale, but, my dear, does it not seem to you that a man who has so attractive a literary manner might employ it to better purposes writing truth rather than such fairy stuff? Clay would be quite as good a hero without that preposterous record. Imagine a man under thirty, if description counts for anything, who had served in Chile with Balmaceda, on the Nile with Wolsey, in Africa as a Chasseur d' Afrique, who had him decorated by the German Emperor for besieging a fort, by the Sultan of Zanzibar for some other reason, and by the Spanish government for presiding over an international Congress of Engineers at Madrid, these being but a few of his acquirements. In addition to all this, Clay had achieved eminence in his profession, had built several railways in various parts of the world, had opened up mines in Chile, Brazil and Peru, yet knew Paris, Vienna and London well enough to talk familiarly over them with a millionaire who had spent his life pleasure seeking. Remember that one does not learn engineering by intuition, and that campaigns take years rather than months."

"But I thought," interrupted the Editor's wife, that you had only dipped into the book.

"Don't mistake me," continued the Editor. "I found 'Soldiers of Fortune' a most entertaining tale, but the author has talent enough to achieve success without burdening his composition with color. Clay would appear just as fine a chap had he been only a brilliant engineer. The foreign record is lugged in and is but the superfluous paint and powder on the face of a beauty."

"It is not Davis' metier to be realistic," objected his wife. "He leaves the mere facts of his wife for Howells to drone over or for Jesting to analyze, and offers us a stirring tale compounded of new material. I liked it immensely, though I object seriously to the shelving of Miss Langham.

"That was a most priggish person," interrupted the Editor, "and she would have made him an insufferable wife. One ought to remember she was not the kind of woman to have assisted in gaining Madame Alvarez. So the proposal under fire could never have been accomplished if it had not been that Clay switched his affections to Hope. Then, Davis does not permit his heroes to marry the women with whom they commence by being in love. We are only wasting time, though, discussing a fairy tale—the brilliant but poor and proud youth who has risen from the dust in love with the cold and haughty beauty, who is also an heiress; the prince, who admires her in a distant, impassive way, and for whom she is evidently intended, and then the little sister, so young and impulsive and yet beautiful and rich like the princess, whom the poor and proud youth marries. Still the youth, having conquered nature and all his difficulties, might also have been permitted to melt the heart of the princess, though I fear he would have had a terrible time living up to her. However, let Dicky Davis give us next the story o. Captain Burke—the brewer of revolutions, you know; let him sedulously avoid the introduction of New York society, and you'll have as good a yarn as any one weaves, even though the smooth-flowing narrative which carries you along so swiftly, so easily, is but two inches and a quarter deep."

I'd rather read of Alice Langham than of Maud in 'Max,'" returned the Editor's wife.

"What is 'Max?'" he asked. "A new novel?"

"Yes," she replied, "by one Julian Croskey, who seems to have crowded innumerable experiences into his first tale. The scene opens in a Shanghai prison, and the hero, who eats opium, rehearses, under the intoxication of the drug, his previous experiences and the episode which has brought him to gaol. He has been engaged fostering a native revolution, beguiled by a lovely Chinese woman, Aysha, who subsequently marries an English Earl and shines in London society. Then we all go to England, accompanying Max, who, being an unfortunate fellow, is at once involved in the troubles which make a most mournful Odyssey out of his wanderings. Though well-meaning, brave and true to his friends, he lacks the decisive power to control circumstances. After mishaps innumerable, he dies by his own hand. No one cares very much."

"You don't do the tale justice," commented the Editor.

"Indeed," replied his wife, "I assumed it was a new novel by a new man because it is so unconfined. It brims over with reflections on life, many of which are wise and true, but the action with less comment would add a dramatic conciseness to the tale which it requires to be effective."

"Let me say to you that the two chapters devoted to dissecting the opium habit are worth a dozen 'Soldiers of Fortune,'" interrupted the Editor. My impression was that the several characters are acutely realized, especially the identity of Max and of Maud. The scenes in which the latter, tired of her husband, ends by her coquetries to win back the regard of her old lover are rendered with rare insight and power. The manner in which his resistance is finally conquered is most naturally done, and one cannot but admit the subtlety of presentation that so keenly expresses the degree of their relationship. Indeed, this episode and that of Naomi, together with the extraordinarily shrewd analysis of Max's mental processes, suggests a new writer of real strength."

"I thought you had only glanced at 'Max,'" murmured his wife.

"Yes," retorted the Editor, "but it was a glance to some purpose. Listen to this remarkable dissertation of the opium craving and its effect on the will. You know that a Chinese opium smoker, as soon as the 'yin' or craving has fixed on his entrails, requires it at least once a day. Max had not from the beginning felt any growing of the temptation from the normal habit of indulging only once in ten days. He always waited for the actual desire of the flesh. Now listen to this:

"On the seventh or eighth day after indulgence, when his digestion and health were recovering their ordinary tone, he would become conscious that the desire was growing up within him again; and then his brain was strong and sound for a day or two until the craving mounted and befogged it.

"It was a terrible state of existence; and the workings of the mysterious medicine were fantastic and inconsequent. It might be that towards the tenth day he was in this sound condition, mentally and bodily, and that his work was progressing with giant strides. Then, as he felt the demon rising, his soul would urge him to resist; he dreaded all the old consequences which he knew would follow, and this importunate soul would tell him that one struggle now, and one or two thereafter, would break the back of the craving and leave him always in possession of his steady flow of health. But if he listened to this insidious righteousness, which, to do the poor fellow justice, was his original nature (for he hated beastliness and loved exercise and the open air), he was soon to learn that the demon within him was a jealous demon. He resisted the climacteric of the craving; well and good. He was playing with a dangerous coquette. It went away, and left his brain in a fog and his body restless and ill at ease; he lost his appetite, and his digestion immediately went wrong. Try as he could, he could not settle down to work; cobwebs at once drew tangles in his brain. Walk as he would, hour after hour, in sun or wind or rain, he could not feel tired or restful or hungry; there was always that uncomfortable vacuum which neither air nor alcohol nor tobacco could fill. And the worst of it was, that the climacteric once allowed to pass, he could not allay this vacuum with opium; no, it was too late—the thing was a coquette. The drug would do him no good; his will, influenced by God knows what demon of the bile, would not even let him try it. He must wait a week till the normal desire should again arise. And having resisted a fortnight, it would seem madness to yield then; all common experience cried out to him to preserve and conquer this alien invader. And then, perhaps, by the use of exercise and alcohol, he would pass a month or six weeks in tranquillity— but only in a medium condition for brain work, every hour of concentration inducing drowsiness. And one day as he cudgelled his brains over a blank sheet of paper, suddenly the desire would invade him—so sweet, so gentle, so insidious, so mighty! Before he knew that the enemy was upon him it would have seized the citadel of his reason and be working on him by irresistible sophistries. Come, come, it would whisper insidiously, why be such a fool?—why go struggling on against cobwebs which you cannot brush away, when with my help your brain will suddenly clear up, take strength, and teem with powerful sustained flights of imagination when your blood will flow warm and rich in your veins, and your appetites will be set free, and you will be wrapped up in a warm world of your own, concentrated and resistless, indifferent to the petty annoyances of life?

"Then a transformation came over the man. His face became suffused with a warm glow, his eyes dilated into swimming darkness, his lips filled and smiled, as stealthily he locked the door, drew the curtains, stirred up the fire, made tea, got out the pipe, lamp, and bottle of smoking mixture, and even lingered to admire himself in the glass. The disgusting truth is that he became exactly like a lustful man who has long tempted some charming mistress, and at length expects her, yielded, to his room. Every detail of preparation was full of sensual delights to the opium-smoker, and he lingered over them as a tiger might toy with his prey; he would have the light just so, the couch in front of the fire, the tea ready for the table by his side; he would pour out his quota of the mixture into a little thick gold pot, he would warm it, perhaps dilute it with a drop of liqueur and grate into it a little Patna dust or hemp-cake; then as he lay on his side before the fire, holding the bamboo pipe in one hand and the needle in the other, he would hesitate to burn the treacle in order to relish all the delight of dallying anticipation. Then how his nostrils sniffed up the rich and heavy odours as the ball of paste on the needle-tip fizzed and bubbled over the small flame of the night-lamp!"

"That is very well done," commented the Editor's wife. "It seems to me that you have read everything that has come in save 'Derelicts.' You will have to accept my conclusions there."

"I'm not unwilling," replied the Editor.

"Then, let me say, 'Derelicts,' of the breed of the modern English novel which is intellect, really a hundred leagues above its predecessors that were written for curates and housewives by widows and spinsters. There is an effort at real characterization and an approximation of the facts of individuality which were never confessed by the older generations of minor novelists. This book does not approach greatness, but it is fairly well done and leaves one with a pleasant impression in one's mind."

"In other words, respectable but uneventful," the Editor put in.

"Better try for yourself," she retorted.

Here they adjourned.

THE THEATRES

Miss Mannering of the Lyceum Company a Disappointment.

There is a young woman up at the Baldwin Theater—Miss Mary Mannering—who has my entire sympathy. I don't know that she is entitled to it, but she has it nevertheless. Miss Mannering has been extravagantly, ill-advisedly boomed by the management of the Lyceum Company as possessing something phenomenal in the way of womanly beauty. The daily press has, in its customary sensational way, pictured her as entirely eclipsing Langtry and all the bevy of stage beauties that history, ancient and modern, has ever known. This is an unfortunate circumstance for Miss Mannering, inasmuch as it is untrue. Assuming the lady herself to be powerless in the matter, I am sorry for her. Immediately she appears upon the stage every woman in the audience has her under critical examination from her teeth to her toes, and scalpel in had, is ready to lay bare every defect of her face and figure.

If the advance agent had been hushed, and the advertising end of the company had been prohibited from proclaiming her "a peerless beauty" and as "a rival of Langtry," etc., I would not feel justified in devoting this much space to Miss Mannering's physical presentment. Beauty is largely a matter of individual taste, but there are striking types that the world recognizes and accepts as standards, and to which it is pretty apt to pay its devotions if permitted so to do. Miss Mannering does not come up to any of these standards. She is gentle, modest and pleasing, and in the absence of the managerial exaggeration of her charms I would pay my devotions to a fine pair of eyes and a graceful, girlish manner. But she is not a beauty of the professional type, and the management does her a wrong to so proclaim her. Nor is she a remarkable actress.

"The Prisoner of Zenda" is a favorite of mine, and Rassendyll would not be Rassendyll in other hands than Hackett's, so admirably does he fit into the character. That "old brick" Colonel Sapt is still in the hands of that sterling actor, Charles Walcot. I should never care to see the "Prisoner of Zenda" with another Rassendyll or another Sapt. The personnel of the company has been altered somewhat since its last Western tour, but I would hardly set down the changes as being improvements upon the former production. So much of society as remained in town or was within easy traveling distance to the city took advantage of the occasion, and the Baldwin during the week was comfortably filled.

Sentiment is the thing in "Shenandoah," sentiment of the stars and stripes and the Union forever; it is the one thing that has brought the play through all these seasons of success. Without Sheridan's ride, without the din and roar of the battle, the floating of flags and the blowing of bugles, "Shenandoah" would be unprofitably stale. The first act is draggy, the last is stupid, and the climax altogether conventional. It is rather late in the day to criticise "Shenandoah"—public sentiment has placed it upon the height of glory, and public sentiment will likely keep it there indefinitely, all of which is quite appropriate; but "Shenandoah" is not a great play—great from a purely histrionic view. It is interesting—tearfully so in many parts, the death of young Haverhill in particular; the love scenes are cleverly constructed, and the signaling is, or was, most meritoriously original. But we should take what the gods or the playwrights, provide, and "Shenandoah" is a dish flavored to suit the great American eagle.

The Frawleys serve it well—as well as experience may expect; the setting of the Shenandoah Valley is pretty, and the signaling on the mountain is well managed. The acting is good throughout. Of the men, J. M. Colville as General Haverhill and Frank Worthing as Colonel Kercheval West are the most noticeable. Mr. Colville is dignified and consistent, every inch a general. Mr. Worthing is at his best in the third act, his conflicting emotions of love and disappointment are quite effectively rendered. A clever bit of character is Harry Corson Clarke's Sergeant Barket. There may be a term to apply to Blanche Bates, a phrase to fit in with her work, but it is far in the shades of the undiscovered. It is probably best to say that she narrowly escapes being a very able actress; as it is, she is popular, natural in many ways, and in the role of Gertrude Ellingham, the tempestuous Southern girl, wears some pretty gowns, and, what is more, loks well in them. Miss Bates hasn't a corner in pretty gowns nor in popularity, either—Miss Georgia Bushby has very much of both. She looks proverbially angelic as Madeline West, and acts very much in the same manner. Gladys Wallis is lovable to the twelfth degree as Jennie Buckthorn, the little Northern girl who would be a boy and a soldier to boot. Dainty are her ways, and bright and pretty is she as a daffodil on a morning in June.

TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG.

The Tavern of Castle Crag was built in the heart of the Sierras, almost at the foot of Mount Shasta, and amid the most picturesque mountain scenery accessible to the tourist. The eligibility of the place selected was due to a rare combination of flowing water, inspiring mountain scenery and inviting forests.

The Tavern of Castle Crag, with its splendid environment, it was believed would appeal chiefly to those who seek a summer resort for health, recreation, outdoor sports, sympathy with nature and informal sociability. To emphasize this intention and signify the kind of invitation extended, the name TAVERN of Castle Crag was chosen.

To avoid all implication of sumptuous accommodations or the tyranny of social formalism, and to realize this original conception, the management has decided to make the Tavern of Castle Crag distinctively a family resort and especially attractive to those to whom health, recreation and sympathy with nature are paramount considerations. To this end rooms on the first and second floors of this splendid tavern with board will be furnished at a monthly rate of $65 a person; and rooms on the third floor with board at a monthly rate of $50 a person.

The accommodations of the Tavern are first class in every particular. Its parlors and halls are elegant and spacious. Its verandas are cool and inviting, placing the guest always in the presence of the most attractive mountain scenery to be enjoyed from the balcony of any tavern in the world.

The opportunity for out door sports embraces hunting, fishing, riding, bicycling, walking on mountain paths and driving on picturesque roads. The Tavern is located immediately on the main trunk line of the California & Oregon Railroad, and is fourteen hours' ride from San Francisco, twelve hours from Stockton, ten hours from Sacramento, thirty hours from Los Angeles and twenty-three hours from Portland. The Tavern of Castle Crag is reached from San Francisco and Sacramento without loss of time. The train leaves San Francisco at 8 o'clock p. m., arriving early the following morning for breakfast, which is always ready upon the arrival of the train. Returning, the train time affords equal accommodation. Thus, both in going and in coming the comfort of the passenger and the economy of his time have been studied. In brief, the Tavern of Castle Crag realizes to its guests the perfect ideal of that spring-time in the high altitudes of the Sierras which never becomes high summer, and is the comfortable home of pleasing recreation and restful repose.

HOWELL'S NEW WOMEN

Some Fresh Types in His Latest Novel.

One is inclined to believe that Mr. Howells' women will live longer, much longer, than his men; certain it is that he succeeds better with women. Perhaps it is because of his extreme delicacy (delicacy carried out to six places of decimals), supersensitive refinement, and his power of observing details, veritably miscoscopic that helps him out in this direction. This sort of machinery applied to the coarser nature of the man sometimes suggests a locomotive at work hauling paper boxes, but it succeeds admirably when used to pick a woman to pieces. For instance, in his latest novel, "The Landlord at Lion's Head," when Bessie Lynde had been kissed by a jay:

She, for her part, realized that she had been kissed as once she had happened to see one of the maids kissed by the grocer's boy at the basement door. In an instant this man had abolished all her defenses of family, of society, of personality, and put himself on a level with her in the most sacred things of life. Her mind grasped the fact and she realized it intellectually, while as yet all her emotions seemed paralyzed. She did not know whether she resented it as an abominable outrage or not; whether she hated the man for it or not. But perhaps he was in love with her, and his love overpowered him; in that case she could forgive him, if she were in love with him. She asked herself whether she was, and whether she had betrayed herself to him so that he was somehow warranted in what he did. She wondered if another sort of man would have done it, a gentleman, who believed she was in love with him. She wondered if she were as much shocked as she was astonished. She knew that there was everything in the situation to make the fact shocking, but she got no distinct reply from her jarred consciousness.

Then, again, in dealing with a character so really impalpable and diaphanous as Cynthia Whitwell, who but Howells could have the power to crystallize such fugitive feminine impressions as this:

She went to the table by the darkening window, and quickly turned up the light of the lamp. In her ignorance of his presence, he saw her as if she had been alone, almost as if she were out of the body; he received from her unconsciousness the impression of something rarely pure and fine, and he had a sudden compassion for her, as for something precious that is fated to be wasted or misprized. At a little movement which he made to relieve himself from a sense of eavesdropping, she gave a start, and shut her lips upon the little cry that would have escaped from another sort of woman.

Mrs. Durgin herself is an old type, but the dissection of her character (it is dissection rather than construction) is carried further than ever novelist carried it before. She is introduced to the reader as the mistress of a decaying New England farmhouse, where visitors from a near-by hotel sometimes come to enjoy the view. Here they meet Mrs. Durgin:

They could scarcely have felt that they ever had a welcome from the stalwart, handsome woman who sold them milk, if they wanted it, and small cakes of maple sugar if they were very strenuous for something else. The ladies were not able to make much of her, from the first; but some of them asked her if it were not rather lonely there, and she said that when you heard the catamounts scream at night, and the bears growl in the spring, it did seem lonesome. When one of them declared that if she should hear a catamount scream, or a bear growl, she should die, the woman answered, Well, she presumed we must all die some time. But the ladies were not sure of a covert slant in her words, for they were spoken with the same look she wore when she told them that the milk was five cents a glass, and the black maple sugar three cents a cake.

But Mrs. Durgin has the capacity of a man of business in selling what the people want, and in making the most out of opportunities, for:

When they told her that her maple sugar would sell better if the cake had an image of Lion's Head stamped on it, she answered that she got enough of Lion's Head without wanting to see it on all the sugar she made. But next year the cakes bore a rude effigy of Lion's Head, and she said that one of her boys had cut the stamp out with his knife; she now charged five cents a cake for the sugar, but her manner remained the same.

Mrs. Vostrand is another admirable type of a not very admirable American woman, the woman whose husband is never in evidence and whom one has to explain to one's friends. She and her daughter are much alike:

The mother had kept her youth in face and figure so admirably that another light she would have looked scarcely the elder. It was the candor of the morning which confessed the fine vertical lines running up and down to her lips, only a shade paler than the girl's, and that showed her hair a trifle thiner in its coppery brown, her blue eyes a little dimmer. They were both very graceful and they had sott, caressing voices; they now began to talk very politely to each other, as if they were strangers, or as if strangers were by.

They are great friends of Westover's, the artist—who, in this story, is Mr. Howells' mouthpiece—and in the artist's reflections, after making a call upon the Vostrands, Howells has touched of the natures of the two women with an accuracy and a nicety of touch that are all his own:

Westover got himself away with a very sweet friendship in his heart for this rather anomalous lady, who, more than half her daughter's life, had lived away from her daughter's father, upon apparently perfectly good terms with him, and so discreetly and self-respectfully that no breath of reproach had touched her. Until now, however, her position had not really concerned Westover, and it would not have concerned him now, if it had not been for a design that formed itself in his mind as soon as he knew that Mrs. Vostrand meant to pass the winter in Boston. He felt at once that he could not do things by halves for a woman who had once done them for him by wholes and something over, and he had instantly decided that he must not only be very pleasant to her himself, but he must get his friends to be pleasant, too. His friends were some of the nicest people in Boston; nice in both the personal and the social sense; he knew they would not hesitate to sacrifice themselves for him in a good cause, and that made him all the more anxious that the cause should be good beyond question.

The only possible difficulty one can find with the story is that it is almost too delicate. Mr. Howells' people have a fineness and perception in the matter of taking affront that makes the reader sometimes ashamed of himself, because he cannot appreciate it as well. It makes one feel coarse-grained and callous somehow, and I think one could forgive "The Dean" for a little more action, a trifle—but the merest trifle—more sensation, if only for the sake of contrast.

As it is not everybody that can find time for week-day trips into the more beautiful parts of the country, the San Francisco and North Pacific Railroad offers special facilities by means of Sunday excursions. Amongst the chief attractions just now is the railroad's fish hatchery, within a mile of Ukiah. The entire route of this road passes through some of the best fishing and hunting districts in the State, and this nursery for trout is interesting not only to the sportsman, but to every intelligent individual. Next Sunday a special excursion has been arranged for to Ukiah, leaving the foot of Clay street by the Tiburon ferry at 8:30 a. m. and returning by 8:30 p. m., allowing four hours at Ukiah. A seat will be provided for every passenger in return for $2, full charge for the round trip.

Style counts more positively in a hat than in a gown. To obtain a chic hat intelligent women go to E. E. Caswell's, 28 Post street. It is interesting to note that all the hats and bonnets in this stock have been reduced to half price.

CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW, the famous orator, statesman, railroad president and millionaire, in an interview said of his recent visit to Del Monte; "I visited Monterey, and I call it the most beautiful place in the world. When Mr. Depew says it is the most beautiful place in the world he knows what he is saying, and means it, for he has seen pretty much all the beautiful and interesting places in the world many times over.

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

A certain bishop, who was about to make a visitation of his doceses, was thus addressed by his spouse, a comely person, who knew his digestion: "Now, Bishop, you mustn't eat any mince pie; for you know it never agrees with you." "No, I won't," said the Bishop, and for a while he withstood the temptation in various quarters. But, at last, he succumbed to an especially choice piece, and it was so good that he ate another. That night he was taken violently ill, and the physician who was summoned was greatly surprised to find how extremely nervous his patient was over his condition. "Why, Bishop, surely, you are not afraid to die?" "Oh, no," said the Bishop, 'I am not afraid, but I am very much ashamed to die."

A brawny Swede visited the City Hall the other day to procure a marriage license, and a couple of clerks to whom he innocently stated his wishes directed him to the department where dog licenses are issued. He approached the license window diffidently, gave his name and address, and asked what the document would cost. "It will cost you $1 a year for every dog you keep," replied the clerk. "Dog?" echoed the Swede. "Why, certainly," continued the clerk, "don't you want a dog license?" "Val, no," cried the would-be benedict. "Ay kaint afford to buy a dog dees year. Ay vant to get only a vooman now."

The head teacher in a Sunday school was much disturbed by the noise of the scholars in the next room, and, mounting a chair, looked over the partition to see who the offenders were. One boy, a little taller than the others, was engaged in rather rapid talk, and the irate instructor, leaning over, seized him by the collar and, lifting him over the partition, banged him into a chair, saying, "Now, be quiet!" About fifteen minutes later a small head appeared around the door, and a small voice meekly piped: "Please, sir, you've got our teacher!"

When Queen Victoria was crowned, the pages attending the Duke of Leinster, who represented Ireland, were the late Lord Otho Fitzgerald and the late Lord Partarlington. After the ceremony, Lord Otho bowed very gravely, but the other little fellow, who was only 7, instead of making a respectful exit, clambered into the lap of the young sovereign, and exclaimed, "How d'ye do, Queen?" much to the delight of Victoria, who was beginning to be weary of the ceremonies of the day.

The little maiden had a French nurse, of whom she was very fond. One day this nurse departed, and her small charge wandered about the house, upstairs and down, into the garden and back again, and finally hung about her mother, who was busy just then with the baby. Receiving no attention, she turned away, saying dejectedly: "Nobody loves me. I guess I'll go down in the garden and eat bugs. I ate free yes'day—two smoove ones and one woolly one."

Senator Cameron once called upon President Lincoln at the White House in behalf of an applicant for a consulate who was a particularly pestiferous person to him. "Where do you want to have him sent?" asked the President. There was a large globe in the room. The Pennsylvania Senator put one arm around it as far as he could reach, and said: "I do not know what my finger is on, but send him there." And he was sent.

A poor woman who kept a small grocery shop in the outskirts of San Jose suffered severely under the application of a tempestous and inebriated husband. He died very suddenly, and one of the customers came to sympathize with the widow. She said: "I am sure, Mrs. G—, you must miss your husband." "Well, mum, it do seem queer to go to the shop and find something in the till!"

An Irish officer, who had the misfortune to be dreadfully wounded in one of the battles in Holland, was lying on the ground, and an unfortunate soldier who was near him, and was also severely wounded, made a terrible howling, when the officer exclaimed: "Hold yer row, will ye? Do you think there is nobody killed but yourself?"

Though she be mild, modest and retiring, Ada Rehan has a clear wit. Standing at the wings of Daly's Theater with Clyde Fitch, one night, he asked: "Are you a quick study, Miss Rehan?" "Yes," replied she. "Then how long will it take you to like me?" "Present or absent?" innocently replied Miss Rehan.

WHAT THE JUBILEE MEANS.

Victoria, Queen and Empress, has reigned for sixty years, and her loyal subjects the world around have been celebrating the fact and rejoicing over it. The occasion itself is not at all significant. To attain a throne early and retain it during a long life must, in these days, be taken as marks of the possession of good health and the favor of fortune rather than of wisdom, valor and fortitude. Prudence is, perhaps, the highest in the list of the virtues which would be indispensable for the accomplishment of a reign of six decades in a country with a monarchy plus a constitution, and with prudence has Her Gracious Majesty Victoria, Queen and Empress, been abundantly endowed. With similar endowment—and some improvements, not to be looked for immediately, among the people over whom he rules—His Catholic Majesty the present small King of Spain, who began to reign from the hour of his birth, might easily surpass the years of the Victorian reign without rivaling the years of Victoria herself. To have sat successfully for sixty years, a period longer than the term of any of her long line of predecessors, on what is undoubtedly the safest and most comfortable throne of Europe, is something for which the venerable Queen may very well be congratulated; to praise her for doing it is unnecessary, to say the least.

Among the forms to which the average Briton resorts for an expression of his patriotism perhaps the first and most usual is that of fervid profession of personal loyalty and devotion to his sovereign and the ascription to her of a large share in the glory of the conquests and advances made by her subjects. And so wherever the jubilee has been celebrated—and that means almost everywhere under the sun—the long roll of British glory has been called, in print and in speech, and the growth of that glorious record during the three score years since Victoria's accession has been marked out and the inference left to be drawn that the credit for it is, in some way and in some part, due to the Queen. But in truth the Queen has had but the smallest part in the triumphs and the achievements of her long reign. She is no more responsible for the great strides of science, the great development of the arts, or the additions to the literature of the English language that have been made in her time than she is for the score or more of wars, great and small, just and unjust, which, as a sovereign reigning but not ruling, she has been obliged to declare and which her subjects have waged in her name. Elizabeth and Anne gave their names to brilliant periods of their country's history to the glory of which they, personally, contributed no more than the Queen has contributed to the glories of the time which will go into history as the Victorian age. Some of Her Majesty's eulogists, realizing, perhaps, how small has been her personal influence and her control of the great power of which she is the nominal head, have betaken themselves, with very questionable taste, to very extravagant praise of the Queen for the purity and womanliness of her private life. Such virtues as they praise so loudly in the Queen are not so rare among women as their praise would leave to be inferred. The vast majority of women are good women, and in these days even queens, to be successful, must be respectable.

The real and notable result and, perhaps, the real purpose of this striking celebration of this climax of Victoria's reign has been to display to the world the tremendous strength and the almost boundless resources of the world-wide British Empire. For years the position of the United Kingdom as a European power has been one of splendid but perilous isolation. The colonies to which she sends a large part of her surplus population and the surplus products of her industries have by many been regarded as elements of weakness in her political and military organization. From the very beginning of the plans for the celebration of this jubilee the part assigned in the display to the colonies and dependencies of the kingdom has been, and not without design, the most prominent. When the Queen rode to St. Paul's on the great day of the celebration through the streets lined with millions of her applauding subjects, she went escorted by troopers, gunners and foot-soldiers from every region of her possessions, the representatives of the world-wide force that guards a world-wide empire. The spectacle then presented was one to give pause to any power which may have covetous designs against any part of the colonial dominions of the British crown. The demonstration has been made that the colonies, recently regarded, even by a numerous party in the United Kingdom itself, as elements of weakness in the empire, as vulnerable points which it would be difficult or impossible to defend against aggressions, may be made a sword and a shield. So long as she is firmly united with her colonies, Great Britain is not isolated, and any great militant power of Europe seeking the spoils of empire might easily break its teeth in vain against the array which could be put afloat and in the field by the United Empire of Great Britain. To inaugurate a policy of consolidation among the scattered parts of the whole empire is, undoubtedly, the second object of the wonderful display made last week in London and at Spithead. With the acknowledgment that all the members of the vast confederacy have a common interest in maintaining it will come the acceptance of the principle that the strength of each member shall be available for the common defense of all, and with such a concert of the British Empire the United Kingdom may feel reasonably secure against the results of the concord or discord of the other powers of Europe.

It is a striking fact that for more than a hundred and fifty years no battle has been fought on British soil. During that long period the frontiers of England have truly been the coasts of her enemies. War has raged often enough in her colonies, in her dependencies, and even in her sister island, but since the day of Culloden the clash of hostile arms has not been heard in England or Scotland. To her sustained dominion of the sea alone Britain owes this immunity from war within her own borders, and it was eminently fitting that the last feature of the great jubilee should be a display of the fact that she still holds her maritime supremacy and of the means by which she holds it. Her empire is sea-born, and only by the continued power to control the sea can it be maintained. If any of the colonial representatives who bore the homage of their constituents to their sovereign had any doubt of the ability of the mother country to do her share in keeping open the sea roads between herself and her daughter nations, that doubt must have been dispelled by the sight of the miles of ships of war that made up the fleet that was reviewed at Spithead last Saturday. What other power could, without seriously interfering with the normal duties of its fleet, gather together for a peaceful display a hundred and sixty-five vessels of war? What other power is sufficiently envious or covetous to assail the empire which has made such a display? To ask those questions peacefully, and to await an answer, is perhaps the only real purpose of the great jubilee.

ALIMONY IN DIVORCE.

There is good sense in the position taken by one of the Los Angeles judges, refusing alimony to a divorced woman, when she was as well able to take care of herself as her husband is to take care of her. There was no separate or community funds to divide, and the court refused to rule the husband's future earnings liable for her support. We say this seems to the lay mind very sensible doctrine, though perhaps it may not prove good law. Indeed, the attitude of our Supreme Court on this question of alimony indicates that the Los Angeles judge, if he had no other reason for his refusal to allow alimony, than the one given, was merely a point of law. It may be that the upper court will not reverse on this point, as it may be a matter of dissension in the lower court, but that a wife has a right to alimony is well established, even though her husband has no property, and she is young, strong and with a fair prospect of remarriage. This matter was very exhaustively considered by our Supreme Court in the Spencer habeas corpus cases taken up from this city six or seven years ago. There a man, who had been divorced and ordered to pay alimony, had remarried and had children by his second wife. He was sent to jail on contempt proceedings for not paying to his first wife the alimony allowed her. Judges Fox, Sharpstein, McFarland, Thornton and Chief Justice Beatty refused to release Spencer unless he paid the alimony. Judge Paterson alone dissented, and his opinion has given much satisfaction to married men with first wives at large. The extreme harshness on the divorced man of the present law cannot be better shown than by extracting from Judge Paterson's opinion.

"I do not believe that the Legislature intended to provide that the immediate daily earnings of a man, having a wife and child dependent upon him for support, should be taken to support the wife of another, because he may have had, at some prior period in his life, the fortune or misfortune to be her husband; yet to that extent of the exigencies of the conclusion reached by my learned associates carry us. It is a construction which seems to me to be at variance with the entire scope and spirit of the law governing the subject of "personal relations." Such a law, if it exist, should be repealed, or the right to an absolute divorce and privilege of remarriage be abolished.

"The law encourages the marriage of persons competent to assume the marriage relations, and fosters its continuance. All contracts and conditions in restraint of marriage are void, being against public policy. In this State divorce is absolute; there is no such thing as divorce from bed and board under the law as it now exists. When a marriage is dissolved, each party is relieved from all the obligations of the bond. From the time of the dissolution they are single persons, and their acts are, as between themselves, the acts of strangers—no obligations or duties are due from one to the other. They are free to marry again—indeed, as stated above, the law encourages them in the assumption of marital rights and obligations.

"Under these provisions a divorced man marries a second or third time. The divorced wife does the same thing. The man upon whom the duty of supporting his family is dependent upon his daily earnings to perform this duty. The woman, who has by the decree of divorce been released from all duties toward him, demands that his earnings, or a portion of them, shall be devoted to her support, and his lawful wife can, and their children must, take what is left. If he refuse to take the bread from them and give it to her who owes him no duty, he may be thrown into jail, and be thus deprived of the power to support any of them. Such a law as this—a law which permits or encourages a man to assume the responsibilities of husband and father, and imposes at the same time such inconsistent conditions, and such unequal and inequitable burdens—ought not to blister the pages of our statute books. Either absolute divorce should be denied and the privilege of remarriage be abolished, or it should be provided—as I believe our laws under proper construction do now provide—that only the property, separate and community, in existence at the time the marriage is dissolved, may be taken for the support of the wife. It is an anomalous condition of domestic affairs which requires a man who has been permitted and encouraged to assume new marital duties and obligations to support a legal relict who is not only matrimonially dead to him, but is perhaps married to another, who is unwilling or unable to support her.

"The leading opinion does not discuss the question whether or not the subject before us can be tested properly on habeas corpus. I deem it unnecessary, therefore, to investigate or consider the fact."

So it appears that a man with a family may be forced in California to let his wife and children starve in order that he may have his money wherewith to pay alimony to another man's wife. The marriage of a divorced woman does not stop the order for alimony. But the judge, when he is a man of the world, realizing how harsh is the law upon a man whose only crime is that he married a woman whom he can't live with, may perhaps use the discretion vested in him, and while granting the divorce refuse permanent alimony. If this were the rule there would be fewer divorces and fewer hasty and ill-considered marriages. No better plan could be devised to put a stop to the modern scheme of marrying one day and divorcing the next than to let it be known that if the women are without children and fully able to take care of themselves they will not be given alimony. A wife may make a sufficient showing to justify a divorce, and yet make no showing which would justify a reasonable court in compelling her husband as long as he lives to support her and any paramours she may choose to take up with. As the law is now administered the alimony provision is too often a provoker of vice; it fills cheap boarding houses with divorced women who live off one man and for another.

BREAKING WILLS.

A very large part of the duty of our State courts is the distribution of the property of deceased persons, either under the provisions of the statutes regulating the succession to property or of the last wills of decedents. The probate business of the courts must always be of great volume and of great importance for the reason that once in every generation practically all the property in the community must pass through and be distributed by the probate courts. Even when the decedent has died without making a will, and when, in consequence, the distribution is made by the court under the provisions of the statute, the process is, at best, tedious and expensive. But it is when the courts are called on to pass upon the validity of wills which are contested by those whose expectations have been disappointed by the testator that the public business is grievously delayed, and that justice, as decided by the mouths of a jury, is most liable to go astray.

The law assures to a man the right to direct, by his last will, the disposal of his property after his death, just as strongly as it assures him in the possession of his right to part with it during his life. But when a testator has made a disposition of his estate which, if made during his life time, would never be attacked, but which, after his death, is found to be not in accord with the anticipations of some of his heirs, the temptation to attack the validity of the will is strong, and the facilities for the attack are always at hand. A will contest, if successful, will pay for itself, and competent lawyers can always be found who will undertake the task of setting aside the dead man's intentions as to the disposal of his estate, looking to the estate so secured from the grasp of the dead hand for the reward of their skill and industry. It is not even necessary for the contestant of a will in our courts to make oath to his own belief in the truth of the statements on the strength of which he asks to have the will declared void. The truth of the allegations in his pleading will be passed on by a jury, and every appeal may be made to the prejudices, the sentiments and the emotions of the jurymen who are to decide. It is not to be wondered that with such temptations and facilities for instituting litigation of this character the probate courts are filled with it, and the discharge of their duties seriously impeded by it. In many cases juries have been persuaded to set aside testamentary dispositions of property which, if made by the testators while living, would never have been open to question at all. This has been accomplished by an appeal to the "'sense of justice' of the jurors, and to their natural prejudices against confirming what seems to them a harsh and unjust treatment of heirs at the hands of testators. But with the justice or injustice of testamentary provisions jurors have nothing to do. Any man who will comply with the provisions of the statute of wills has a perfect right to make his will as harsh and as unnatural as he chooses toward any or all those who, in default of a will, would be his heirs, and it is the duty of the courts and of juries to sustain and enforce the provisions of such a will as they would sustain if it squared with the common idea of what is just and natural under such circumstances. Juries do not exist to do justice in accordance with what may be their personal ideas of justice in any given case. It is their duty to pass upon disputed questions of fact which are submitted to them in the manner prescribed by law. Nor do courts sit "to do justice," as that expression is generally understood. It is the duty of the court to declare and speak the law, and to do justice only as that law directs, even when that direction may seem to lead to injustice and hardship. It has always been, and no doubt it always will be,difficult to keep prejudice and sentiment and emotion out of the jury box, and to keep the decisions of the jurymen within the limits of the law; and in cases in which a contested will is submitted for decision this difficulty will always be great. In proportion to the probability of error in such decisions, and the grave results of such error, is the necessity for a full and careful review of such cases by a court of appeal removed from the atmosphere in which the jury may have gone astray. Our Supreme Court has by its action in two recent cases indicated that such cases are to be closely scrutinized on appeal, and that where there is sufficient reason to believe that the jury has reached a conclusion under the influence of passion or prejudice the conclusion will be overruled. The right of a testator to make what would generally be considered as an unnatural, unjust or cruel will is strongly declared, and such wills will be sustained if no more valid objections can be urged against them. One result of these recent decisions will be the discouragement of frivolous and speculative contests of wills. Another result will be to improve the probability that in such cases justice will be done according to law and not according to the caprice or the momentary sympathy of juries.

There was a prolonged debate recently in the House of Commons on the question of the time to be allotted to speakers, and in course of his remarks on the subject Major Rasch convulsed the House by stating that he had been compelled on one occasion to bring in a bill for the compulsory marking of shrimps in the interest of his constituents on the East Coast.

Statistics show a deficit of 1,000,000 marks in the Baltic canal. During the last year 19,960 vessels, of 1,848,458 tons, have passed through this waterway. Of this number, 17,862 vessels were German, 828 were Danish, 219 were British, 455 were Swedish and 375 were Dutch.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The impression that certain enthusiastic Democrats are engaged in spreading abroad that this Western trip of the Boy Orator is a triumphal tour should be accepted with reservation. The truth is, Mr. Bryan's star is on the decline. He has found nothing new to say since the campaign was over, and the clamorous accusations that the election of McKinley has not assisted prosperity is being negatived throughout the East by the stir of reviving business. The fact is that prosperity has begun to dawn on the Atlantic Coast, and with better times the vogue of Bryanism must inevitably cease. I am told his views may no longer be considered as the views of the party, however strenuously the "Examiner" may contend to the contrary. On his arrival in San Francisco there will, of course, be a spirited demonstration, though the brilliancy of the occasion will be sadly minimized by the absence of Mr. Lane's contribution. In consequence thereof the project of the reception committee, to hire a special car to take the great man to Los Angeles, has fallen through.

There is not a lover of clean amateur sport nor a single patriotic American between the oceans that should not take off his hat to-day to the eight young men of the Cornell 'varsity crew and their wonderfully clever coach, who, by their combined efforts, showed their rudder to Harvard and Yale on Friday last. The Poughkeepsie race was not merely a triangular contest between three rival crews. It had an international significance vastly more important. Old England and Young America in reality went over the course, and America won so handily that their English-trained competitors hardly made the race interesting. Three distinct systems of rowing were on trial — the pure English (Harvard), the English-American (Yale), and the pure American (Cornell). Nothing could have been more decisive than Cornell's demonstration of the superiority of the American stroke. Not only was her eight some fifteen pounds lighter than either of her rivals, but she rowed fewer strokes to the minute than did Harvard or Yale. At the finish Cornell was three lengths ahead of Yale and nearly ten ahead of Harvard. The American-trained crew were so fresh that they rowed on for another half mile to receive the acclamations of the spectators, while the two crews trained under English methods crossed the line in a state of collapse, Numbers 2 and 3 in the Yale boat in a dead faint, and Numbers 3 and 5 of the Harvard eight almost unconscious. The race is as much a triumph over England as if Cornell had crossed oars with Oxford or Cambridge, and if that plucky eight should try conclusions with the English boats this year at Henley it is quite possible that the British coxswains, too, might have an opportunity of examining the configuration of the American shell's stern.

It may now be state with some definiteness that the wheat crop of California will be a fair average yield. reaching something in the neighborhood of 840,000 tons. At ruling prices this means about $24.50 per ton, which should give the farmer a reasonable profit on his operations. Thus far, however, the growers are holding their grain in the hope of better prospects. Over Sausalito way there is a fleet of British ships awaiting charter. They headed here on the notice given the world that our harvest would exceed by many thousand tons the average. Many of them refused what would now be considered good terms in the hope of obtaining better prices. In the meantime they block the entrance to Richardson Bay with their great red hulls and make the most picturesque feature in the harbor.

The condition of affairs in the Kennedy mine is a bit uncomfortable for those gentlemen who have acquired the habit of drawing down big monthly dividends from the property. As I stated recently, the ore body has fallen off in value. The Kennedy rock was of a high grade, but that encountered on the new level is of poor quality. However, it will yield a fair return if can be got to the surface, but the old shaft proves inadequate under the new conditions. The experts invoked to examine the property have prescribed the construction of a vertical, three-compartment shaft which should touch the new ore body and render easy its transportation to the surface. But besides being a costly work, this would practically stop operations during the two years required for its construction. Pending the new developments, the old shaft is being extended down further, and the directors trust the low grade ore may soon give place to rock of a richer quality.

The latest financial scheme started to settle the vexed question of country property has virtues which are liable to win the regard of the antagonistic classes—the moneyed and the moneyless. It is pretty well known that though business throughout the State is seriously depressed it is not because of the absence of coin, but rather on account of the timidity of bankers. New ideas must be discovered to capture the fancy of the capitalist, and certain clever financiers have found a way. The desideratum in the East is income-paying property—investments that will bring in dollars per annum. The interior valleys of California are covered with fine farms and orchards, bearing excellent crops, the owners of which, for the most part, men who have borne the heat and burden of planting, are struggling under a dead weight of mortgages. In many instances such properties are owned by banks that have foreclosed. Yet they are productive and reliable concerns, and need only a year or two of plenty to make their owners comfortable. Recognizing this, certain Boston men have been traveling the San Joaquin and Sacramento Valleys purchasing ranch properties at the lowest valuations and securing in regard to each the most reliable data available. The promise of this is generally a guarantee of twelve and fifteen per cent. on the investment. The next step is to incorporate a company, issue bonds bearing eight per cent. interest on the real security and floating these in the East, the dealer depending for his profit on the difference between the total earnings and the expenses. The original owner of the property is put in charge at a fair salary and the situation is accomplished. The character of the investment makes an attractive prospectus; the idea is well founded, really, the difficulty with our California orchards has always been the poverty of the planters, and the new buyer takes his place at the moment of productivity. It is no wonder that the bonds have been taken by conservative institutions and have found a ready welcome among people of small means, to whom eight per cent. is fortune. In the meantime the idea is helping to solve some of our difficulties, and, as it is extended, cannot fail to put the interior on a better footing and relieve the uneasiness of certain very respectable banking institutions.

The downfall of Collector Welburn makes a very sad episode in the history of this curious town of ours. Four years ago this man enjoyed an enviable reputation and a position in the Democracy which seemed to guarantee the fulfillment of whatever aspirations his ambition might dictate. He had come from Gilroy and had the prestige that a clever countryman gains in a metropolitan council. He was also steady, diplomatic and intelligent. He said neither too much nor too little, and had the gift of making friends. Elected vice-president of the State Central Committee, he assisted in the campaign which turned California democratic for Cleveland, and was appointed Collector of Internal Revenue. For an ambitious man there is no place as important as the revenue office, inasmuch as its occupant is brought into connection with powerful political influences and he is enabled to make alliances of a character liable to yield him the most competent kind of backing. Besides, through his deputies, he can come near controlling the make-up of conventions. Welburn began well, appointed his friends to office, and seemed competent to take advantage of the great chance that had opened for him. Alas, he was from the country and the temptations of the town proved more than his manhood could resist. Almost without warning he yielded to the seductions of the Tenderloin. Of a sudden he lost his grip upon himself quite completely and began knocking himself to pieces in a manner wholly and absolutely inconsistent with all his past life. His friends were astonished. Their efforts to save him proved abortive. His career is now at an end; politically he has committed suicide, has jumped overboard, quite literally thrown himself away, blind to his best interests, ignoring his chances, casting his prospects from him and giving the lie to all the training and habits of a hitherto upright life. Cashier Norton is the same. But his story is finished and done for. It would be interesting to know just what kind of devil enters into these men after thirty, forty and even fifty years of probity. A powerful, resistless devil beyond any question, for it gets them on the run to hell in short order, and once going there is no chance to stop.

But here is a stranger suicide than that of Cashier Norton. Norton did himself to death after evil has been committed, but here is this man Cannon up there in Tuolumne County who takes his life after years of well-doing. There is a great deal that is grim and tragic about the affaire Cannon. An extraordinary man beyond any doubt, a long time ago, when he was starting out in life, Cannon had plenty of money and in his profession of mining engineer was considered an authority. His trouble began by the sudden collapse of his mining schemes and the loss of every penny of his fortune. Then practically at the same time he became maimed for life. He was skating somewhere in Nevada carrying a loaded gun. Managed somehow to slip and fall, and six months later left the hospital one arm gone and his right leg useless. He left the hospital to return to his wife and children. Here was a fine position for a young man, but Cannon went at it with teeth and fists clinched, resolved with all the strength of his will that come what would he would make enough money and leave his wife and children in comfortable circumstances. So he started in, maimed and deformed and without a cent. But he was a good miner and expert in his calling. Little by little he got upon his legs again, promoted some mining schemes that turned out well. Then bought a mine and sold it at a profit, bought one or two more and worked them to advantage. He starved and toiled and labored day after day, month after month, year after year, always having his ironclad resolve in view. At last everything was to his satisfaction but a certain litigation over the title to one of his mining properties. In the end this was decided in his favor, his title was clear, his wife and children comfortably provided for. The man's life-work was done and then without hint or premonition, without so much as a word to his dear ones, this extraordinary fellow locks himself in his room and quietly blows out his brains.

It is to be regretted that the Sunday "Examiner" saw fit to abuse and ridicule the Hotel Del Monte in its last issue. After all is said the Del Monte is one of the great summer resorts of the world, and has done the State an immense amount of good. The Monarch's enmity to the railroad is understood, but a hotel such as that at Monterey is much more than a private institution. It acts as a tremendous inducement in the way of bringing Eastern tourists (and incidentally Eastern money) to the coast. The policy of the local dailies seems to have only censure and criticism for local projects and enterprises, and the "Examiner" heads the van in this respect. Not only is the Del Monte a drawing card for the State, but especially is it such for San Francisco itself. Perhaps nearly a thousand people visit the hotel yearly who afterwards come up to the city to swell the registers of the caravansaries here, and to spend their money upon Kearny and Market streets. Without the existence of Del Monte this crowd would, it is quite probable, be directed to San Diego or to Castle Crags, and San Francisco would entirely lose the benefit of its patronage.

THE CRUISER "HI-YEI"

She Has Fought at Wei-Hei-Wei and at the Yalu River.

Even if the Hi-Yei, the visiting Japanese cruiser, is wood instead of steel, she is quite imposing enough for photographic and descriptive purposes, and when you are told, in the broken English of one of the sub-lieutenants that she took an active part in the battle of the Yalu River, you begin to regard her as quite a distinguished personage. By the way, you mustn't speak her name as though you were calling a 'bus or a newsboy—"Hi-yi! Hi-yi!"—because it is pronounced this way: "He-Yay." But this en passant. She is a training-ship, this "He-Yay," with a complement (I trust this is the technical word) of three hundred and twenty-five men and eighteen cadets. The cadets are the raison d'etre for the ship, as she is their means of learning navigation and gunning and the management of men and all that goes to makes up the whole duty of the seaman. The midshipman system, so it appears, obtains in the Japanese Navy, and it is to that grade that the cadets are appointed as soon as they have done their practice-work with sextant and cannon and compass.

The Hi-Yei is just a bit old-fashioned — at least so she appears to the observer fresh from the trim smartness of the Monadnock or the Bennington. One must remember that she was built eighteen years ago. She is a twelve-knot boat, of twenty-three hundred tons displacement and twenty-five hundred horsepower, and for battery sports two 8-inch and four 7.2-inch Krupps and six Nordenfeldts.

I have an idea that such a ship is seen at a disadvantage in her present condition and circumstances. You come away with a certain impression of haphazardness, of easy-going good nature on the part of the crew, and a vague, hardly defined familiarity between officers and subalterns, and between subalterns and men, that would rather astonish an American man-o'-warsman, and that would make an English naval commander curse God and die. But from one point of view the Hi-Yei is far above the best ship of either England or America. It may be an exaggeration, and the point of view may be a false one, yet somehow if it came to grapples, I would prefer a berth on board the Hi-Yei to one on the Camperdown, for instance, or the Texas, for this reason: The Hi-Yei has been proven — has received the famous "baptism of fire" that the war correspondents love to write about. She has been under fire, has shot and been shot at, knows the meaning of a real battle, and the feel of the water churned and eddid by squadrons in actual maneuver. You would be sure that after her little go on the Yalu that the Hi-Yei wouldn't suddenly fill and sink of her own accord, or ram a friendly hull, or turn turtle, as did the battleship of our dear Spanish friends in the Bay of Biscay. The Texas and the Camperdown, for all their gay paint and trim, smart drilling, and gray, grim guns (as, perhaps, Stephen Crane would call 'em) are amateurs at best. The Hi-Yei, wood-built, slow, and out of date, with her slackly-drilled crew, equipment and uniforms the worse for wear, is the professional—one of the few ships of the world's navies that has committed assault with intent to kill.

THE HI-YEI IN THE STREAM

FRANK NORRIS.

The French are hard to please, no matter how you take them. Just now Paris is exercised over the telegrams of condolence as to the Charity Bazaar fire, received from the Czar and from the Kaiser. The Boulevards are displeased with the Czar's message because it arrived so late, and with that of the Kaiser because it arrived too early. The German Emperor's telegram was rushed upon the wires through to the capital with all the haste of a war dispatch from Thessaly, while his contribution of $2,000 to the charitable fund was almost placarded upon the streets. It is bitter for Paris to have her national and hereditary foe paint his advertisement, as it were, upon the very catafalque. Not the least exasperating feature of the affair is that Paris can do nothing but say thank you. As a crowning annoyance to the whole affair that grim visaged, sternly moral old prelate, the Francescan Monk Olliver, who was selected to preach the funeral oration, took the occasion to denounce the follies and foibles of the capital in such unmeasured terms that for a time Paris was more occupied with this denunciation than with the catastrophe which had provoked it.

The Editor and His Wife Discuss the Monthlies, Their Contents and Editing.

"'Tis now the witching hour of the month when the magazines impose their bulk upon our leisure hours," said the editor sententiously. He was turning over the morning's mail, which was heavy with books and booklets and newspapers from all the world over. His wife was deep in La Gallienne's version of the 'Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam' in the 'Cosmopolitan,' and had already possessed herself of the contents of the 'Atlantic' and 'Harper's,' which lay open and cut on the floor beside her.

"It's good to have the leaves cut for one in advance," commented the editor lazily. "Still these are only folded front and side—the very worst happens when they are also impenetrable at the bottom, like 'McClure's.'"

"That is true," returned his wife, "but you must remember McClure's costs but 10 cents, and it is good value for the money. You are likely to find in it a Kipling yarn, and, you know, Kipling comes high nowadays."

"The pictures in 'McClure's' are generally poor, whereas the 'Cosmopolitan's' and 'Munsey's' are carefully over-engraved," continued the editor, dispassionately. "But on the subject of pictures, did you notice Zogbaum's illustrations to General Forsyth's discription of Sheridan's ride to Winchester? They are capital, both as reproductions and as compositions—cleverly drawn, and spirited, especially that on page 173; though Zogbaum has not caught the proper action of the hero's horse, which gallops in the good old style that photography has superseded."

"I read the article," returned his wife. "If General Forsyth wrote all of it, he should be allowed to devote his leisure hours to literature. Why, the description of the scenery of the Shenandoah valley is beautifully done and worthy a distinguished craftsman, which the General is with the sword, rather than with the pen."

"I don't care whether he wrote or dictated it," explained the editor, "or if he only assisted in compiling the article. It makes a charming feature, and certainly is an authentic tale of one of the most stirring incidents of the war. I see, though, he denies the 'terrible oath' of the poem—says he did not hear Sheridan utter it."

"Anyway," said his wife, "Forsyth gives us another good war tale. It is about his return to headquarters—you know he was a member of Sheridan's staff and had made the great ride with him—after the battle. He had followed Custer's cavalry in pursuit of the retreating Confederates and then, returning down the road, essayed to count the cannon captured from the enemy. It was pretty dark and almost impossible to distinguish between guns and caissons. To make sure, Forsyth dismounted and tested each piece with his fingers, and he reached headquarters at 9:30. He reported to Sheridan, who inquired, peremptorily, 'Where do you come from?' 'From Strasburg,' was the reply. 'What news?' 'The road is lined with transportation of every kind, and we have captured forty-four pieces of artillery.' 'How do you know that we have forty-four pieces of artillery?' 'I placed my hand on each and every gun!' Then Forsyth adds, 'Standing there in the firelight I saw my chief's face light up with a great wave of satisfaction.'"

"How can you 'light up with a great wave?'" asked the editor.

"That is hypercriticism," returned his wife, "and unworthy; but have you read Hawthorne's article on the Indian famine in the 'Cosmopolitan?'"

"Yes," assented the editor. "To my mind it was a mistake to publish so small an installment of Hawthorne's narrative. Though the description is excellent work and strongly written, it merely presents circumstances without construction. There is your spectacle, but no illuminating opinion. That, possibly, will be given subsequently. There is nothing in the context, however, to justify the editorial introduction, which strikes me as a cheap and vulgar piece of clap trap, palpably written to catch the ears of the groundlings. We are asked to read between the lines a condemnation of British rule in India. One gathers no such impression from the narrative. The mere fact that when England conquered India its population was but 150,000,000 against 300,000,000 today, is surely conclusive evidence of the contrary. Indeed, one is forced to realize that the very humanity of British rule is responsible for the famine, as the population, apparently, is greater than the land can sustain."

"I suppose that is material for controversy," interrupted his wife, "but the subject is beyond me. To revert to the other monthlies again—I find 'The Martian' has run its course. Have you followed it?"

"Have you?" asked the editor, cautiously.

"Assuredly," she answered. "It does not catch one as 'Trilby' did, but is rather after the fashion of 'Peter Ibbetson' than of its immediate predecessor. There is much imagination and more discursiveness, and the pictures render the Du Maurier woman in all the glory of her English loveliness. The July 'Harper's' has a new serial, 'The Kentuckians,' by John Fox, Jr., which begins excellently, and in the 'Century' 'Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker' draws to a close. That is a novel I shall read when it emerges. Otherwise the new 'Century' is rather sporty—'Hunting Big Game in India and Africa,' by H. W. Seton-Karr; 'Jaguar Hunting in Venezuela,' and 'Seventeenth Century Sport'—all generously illustrated. Cole's engraving of 'Garrick and his wife' is inimitable, and quite the finest picture in the July magazines."

"Richard Watson Gilder declares the 'Century' always contains at least one picture that is worth more than the price asked for the magazine," said the editor. "But to my mind this is not as good a 'Century' as the May issue, for instance."

"For that matter the second installment of T. P. O'Connor's 'Celebrities of the House of Commons' does not compare with the first," his wife suggested. "There is nothing intimate in his comment on Lord Salisbury, and one is not admitted to the secret of a personality which is that of one of the most fascinating men in Europe. But you ought to read Howell's essay on the 'Modern American Mind!'—also in 'Harper's'; it's a delightfully clever piece of diagnosis full of delicacy and insight. He claims that Americans have learned modesty and are recovered from the superlative self-assertion that characterized us in the period after the war. The quiet of our patriotism strikes him as a notable fact, explained by the idea that we are like people whose religion has become their life. We trust the republic more than ever, and realize that our safety is in our own keeping. It is not an article you want to quote from, though; it must be read."

"There are some excellent articles in the 'Atlantic,'" said the editor. "'Godkin on the Decline of Legislatures,' for instance. He claims that legislative councils throughout the world have all deteriorated save the British Parliament, and attributes it, among other reasons, to the absence of connection between the levying and spending authorities which characterizes the American system, in particular. He suggests that our Legislatures meet only at intervals of five or ten years, and that all measures of important legislation be submitted to the people. Woodrow Wilson discusses the nation as a nation, and concludes that our government suffers from a lack of national leadership. Both articles are intelligent and should be read by all students of the American system. It is quite the best number of the 'Atlantic' has had this year—indeed, it is to-day among the great critical magazines of the world."

"Let us not forget that remarkable publication, the 'Ladies' Home Journal,'" said the editor's wife. "That is not a sneer, is it?" asked the editor. "To my mind that is the smartest journal in the country—the idea and handling of it are very clever, and the articles selected with a consummate insight into the tastes of its immense clientelle. We may all laugh at E. W. Bok's advice to girls who have graduated and gibe at his discussion of 'going away in summer,' but the stuff is read and thought about. The July number contains an interesting article by W. G. Jordan on the 'Greatest Nation on Earth'—the United States, of course, and one by G. W. Smalley, on the 'Personal Side of the Prince of Wales.' However, the magazine has nothing just now as good as its Harrison contributions."

"I was surprised at the weakness of the American girl picture on the inside page," said his wife. It makes rather a poor engraving. However, I want to read the latest little bit of Well's 'War of the World' in the 'Cosmopolitan, so if you will pardon me I'll retire."

ORACLE K. B.

RICHARD LA GALLIENNE

This is the young English poet who has dared a new version of the "Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam." It is a graceful and sensuous rendering of the great Persian poet, beautiful rather than strong, and will hardly disturb the vogue of Fitzgerald's version

On the occasion of the opening of a new golf club house at St. Andrew's, lately, Lord Rosebery made a very entertaining little speech. In touching upon the infatuation for the game he remarked that probably Dr. Boyd, of St. Andrews, and himself, were the only two Scotchman in existence who did not play golf. He also observed that a man once seriously inoculated with the love of golf is of very little use for any other purpose afterwards, while he mentioned that amongst his friends was a man of considerable possessions and large business transactions, who declines to open his letters in the morning on which he is going to play golf, for fear anything in them should distract his attention.

The New York "Herald's" attempt to raise a fund for the relief of Mark Twain is received curiously in Hartford, where the great humorist has made his home. The actual fact is, though somewhat harrowed with debt, the amount he is likely to receive from the proceeds of his forthcoming work to be published by the American Publishing Company, of that city, will more than liquidate his entire indebtedness. Meantime he is in receipt (through his wife) of the income from the sale of his twenty or more copyrighted works, amounting to several thousand dollars a year. He has an offer of a very large sum for a lecture tour in this country. His wife is possessed of considerable property, including two or three handsome residences. They are traveling in Europe with two or three servants at the present time.

IMPRESSIONS

The Success of Gelett Burgess — A Sensation at Hopland.

Yet a few more days and the Christian Endeavorers will descend upon the city like an invading army, crowding the streets, filling up the hotels, and overloading every means of transportation. Apropos of transportation, it is understood that the railroad company has made some stupendous exertions in the matter of handling this influx of Eastern visitors. It may be confidently asserted that eighteen thousand is to be the number of Endeavorers that will come in from various cities and towns east of the Mississippi. To meet the demands of this tribal migration the Southern Pacific is to put on seventy-two trains. The number is really unprecedented. Fancy if these trains were placed end to end along a reach of track they would make a solid line of coaches and engines eight miles in length.

The news has filtered westward to this coast that the sometime editor and perpetrator of the "Lark," Gelett Burgess, is making the New York public "sit up" in a most sudden and amazing fashion. Mr. Burgess, to use his own expression, went "toward the East" this spring without any definite plans in mind, merely stuffing his pockets with "Lark" manuscript to be sprung upon Eastern editors. He sprung them with such good effect, we understand, that he has commissions galore to write for Atlantic coast periodicals. "Truth" is to take a series of "Goup" cartoons and Quatrains. "Scribner's" has made an offer for the Vivette papers, published serially in the "Lark." "Life" is also prepared to "take stuff," and it is even reported that so staid and conservative a publication as "Harper's Monthly" has opened its columns to the eccentric little genius from California. All of which goes to proove that San Francisco is an admirable training-school for literateurs, despite the apathy of its public and its distrust of local merit. Burgess will catch on in the East, there can be little doubt, and will make for himself more money and reputation in two months of New York than in two years of San Francisco. It has been said by one of Les Jeunnes that whoever can make a success in San Francisco can make a success in New York. What, then, is the good of waiting in San Francisco?

A banquet is jolly good fun at any time, and a banquet of actors and theatrical people particularly so, but when such a banquet is held on the stage of a theater that is celebrating a little decimal "Jubilee" of its own, there is an effervescence of jollity in the air that can only be compared to very particularly dry champagne. Such was the character of the festivity with which the Orpheum management celebrated the tenth year of the existence of the theater and simultaneously ushered in its second decade. A gathering of the choicest spirits in the worlds of drama and journalism came together on the stage of the Orpheum on Wednesday night of this week at midnight, after the end of the performance, and made merry til the small hours grew to large ones. Ferris Hartman was toastmaster and presided over the ceremony as only Ferris could. Incidentally he was assisted by Supervisor Rottanzi and the artists who are now performing at the Orpheum. The gastronomic plot, as the menu was termed, was quite an elaborate affair, beginning with oyster cocktails (without feathers) and continuing bravely on through salads (with sky borders), cucumbers (tormentors), till it culminated in champagnes (Mumm's the word, or any other brand).

Hopland has a sensation, or rather had, for the tale is twice told by now. Staid, dignified, conventional Hopland has furnished the material for a newspaper story of a sensational nature. Once upon a time not so very long ago there lived in Hopland a certain Dr. Pike, who had a fairly good clientele of patients in the country side, a comfortable little home, and a professional gig with a good roadster in the shafts. Also he had a wife. She is the one that makes the story—of course. In course of time that which happens to all good doctors happened to Doctor Pike. He died. This was but a few months ago. The dead doctor died and was buried under four feet of nice, heavy, soggy brown dirt. All the Hoplanders went about extolling his virtues and condoning with the wife, who married a young man of inferior social position a few weeks after the funeral. Consternation! (Can't you see the thrill that ran from end to end of Hopland—and the awe-struck "gibble-gibble" of the old women over their tea-cups.) Well, the two were married in the face of public opinion, but "determined to brave it out," "live it down"—said as much defiantly with their chins in the air—all that sort of thing. But on the night of the day they were married dark forms could have been seen stealing through the streets of the town and concentrating upon the Pike house. (This may sound like a description of a lynching—but there is no lynching to follow, be assured.) No, it was not a lynching, but a "chivaree," and at a signal a terrible clamor split the Hopland atmosphere. Tin horns, tin pans, pot lids, dinner bells, every conceivable contrivance for making a noise, aided and abetted, naturally enough, by lugubrious cat-calls, groans and howls. Up went a window. The crowd fell silent on the instant. The widow—I mean the bride—was there, and judge for yourself the horrible embarrassment of the charivarists when she launched upon them this burning reproach: "Ain't ye 'shamed," said the widowed bride. "Ain't ye 'shamed to make such a noise around this house, and Doctor Pike not three weeks dead."

An extraordinary sensation has been made in English fruit circles by the arrival of the big seedless California oranges, not only on account of their appearance and proportions, but exquisite flavor as well. According to the principal journal of the fruit growers the seedless orange has come to stay, and will head the list by a great lead and rank in the wholesale fruit markets of Great Britain as the finest orange in the trade.

The Strangest Thing

By FRANK NORRIS

The best days in the voyage from Southampton to the Cape are those that come immediately before and immediately after that upon which you cross the line, when the ship is as steady as a billiard table, and the ocean is as smooth and shiny and colored as the mosaic floor of a basillica church, when the deck is covered with awning from stem to stern, and the resin bubbles out of the masts, and the thermometer in the companion-way at the entrance to the dining-saloon climbs higher and higher with every turn of the screw. Of course all the men people aboard must sleep on deck these nights. There is a pleasure in this that you will find nowhere else. At six your steward wakes you up with your morning cup of coffee, and you sit cross-legged in your pajamas on the skylight and drink your coffee and smoke your cigarettes and watch the sun shooting up over the rim of that polished basillica floor, and take pleasure in the mere fact of your existence, and talk and talk and tell stories until it's time for bath and breakfast.

We came back from the Cape in The Moor, with a very abbreviated cabin list. Only three of the smaller tables in the saloon were occupied, and those mostly by men — diamond - brokers from Kimberly, gold - brokers from the Rand, the manager of a war correspondent on a lecture tour, cut short by the Ashanti war, an English captain of twenty-two, who had been with Jamison at Krugersdorp and somehow managed to escape, an Australian reporter named Miller, and two or three others of a less distinct personality.

Miller told the story that follows early one morning, sitting on the Bull board, tailor-fashion, and smoking pipefuls of straight perique, black as a nigger's wool. We were grouped around him on the deck in pajamas and bath robes. It was half after six, the thermometer was at 70 degrees, The Moor cut the still water with a soothing rumble of her screw, and at intervals flushed whole schools of flying fish. Somehow the talk had drifted to the inexplicable things that we had seen, and we had been piecing out our experiences with some really beautiful lies. Captain Thatcher, the Krugersdorp chap, held that the failure of the Raid was the most inexplicable thing he had ever experienced, but none of the rest of us could think of anything we had seen or heard of that did not have some stealthy, shadowy sort of explanation sneaking after it and hunting it down.

"Well, I saw something a bit thick once," observed Miller, pushing down the tobacco in his pipe bowl with the tip of a callous finger, and in the abrupt silence that followed we heard the noise of dishes from the direction of the galley.

"It was in Johannesburg three years back, when I was down on me luck. I had been rooked properly by a Welsh gaming chap who was no end of a bounder, and three quid was all that stood between me and——well," he broke in, suddenly, "I had three quid left. I wore down me feet walking the streets of that bally town looking for anything that would keep me going for a while, and give me a chance to look around and fetch breath, and there was nothing, but I tell ye nothing, and I was fair desperate. One dye, and a filthy wet dye it was, too, I had gone out to the race track, beyond Hospital Hill, where the pony races are run, thinking as might be I'd find a berth, handling ponies there, but the season was too far gone, and they turned me awye. I came back to town by another road — then by the waye that fetches around by the Mahomedan burying-ground. Well, the pauper burying-ground used to be alongside in those dyes, and as I came up, jolly well blown, I tell ye, for I'd but tightened me belt by wye of breakfast, I saw a chap diggin' a gryve. I was in a mind for gryves meself just then, so I pulled up and leaned over the fence and piped him off at his work. Then, like the geeser I'd come to be, I says:

" 'What are ye doing there, friend?' He looked me over between shovelfuls a bit, and then says:

" 'Oh, just setting out early violets;' and that shut me up properly.

"Well, I piped him digging that gryve for perhaps five minutes, and then, s' help me, I asked him for a job. I did—I asked that gryve-digger a job—I was that low. He leans his back against the side of the gryve and looks me over, then by and bye, says he:

" 'All right, pardner.'

" 'I'm thinking your from the Stytes,' says I.

" 'Guess yes,' he says, and goes on digging.

"Well, we came to terms after a while. He was to give me two bob a dye for helping him at his work, and I was to have a bunk in his 'shack,' as he called it—a box of a house built of four boards, as I might sye, that stood just on the edge of the gryveyard. He was a rum 'un, was that Yankee chap. Over pipes that night he told me something of himself, and do y' know, that gryve-digger in the pauper burying-ground in Johannesburg, South Africa, was a Harvard Grad.! Strike me straight if I don't believe he really was. The man was a wreck from strong drink, but that was the one thing he was proud of.

" 'Yes, sir,' he'd say, over and over again, looking straight ahead of him, 'Yes, sir, I was a Harvard man once, and pulled at number five in the boat'—the 'varsity boat, mind ye; and then he'd go on talking half to himself. 'And now what am I? I'm digging gryves for hire—burying dead people for a living, when I ought to be dead meself. I am dead and buried long ago. It's just the whiskey that keeps me alive, Miller,' he would say; 'when I stop that I'm done for.'

"The first morning I came round for work I met him dressed as if to go to town, and carrying a wickered demijohn. 'Miller,' he says, 'I'm going into town to get this filled. You must stop here and be ready to answer any telephone call from the police station.' S' help me if there wasn't a telephone in that beastly shack. 'If a pauper cops off they'll ring you up from town and notify you to have the gryve ready. If I'm awye, you'll have to dig it. Remember, if it's a man, you must dig a six foot six hole; if it's a woman, five feet will do, and if it's a kid, three an' half 'll be a plenty. S' long.' And off he goes.

"Strike me blind but that was a long dye, that first one. I'd the pauper gryves for view and me own thoughts for company. But along about noon, the Harvard Grad. not showing up, I found a diversion. The Grad. had started to paint the shack at one time, but had given over after finishing one side, but the paint pot and the brushes were there. I got hold of 'em and mixed a bit o' paint and went the rounds of the gryves. Ye know how it is in a pauper burying-ground—no nymes at all on the headboards—naught but numbers, and half o' them washed awye by the rynes; so I, for a diversion, as I sye, started in to paint all manner o' fancy nymes and epitaphs on the headboards — any nyme that struck me fancy, and then underneath, an appropriate epitaph, and the dytes, of course—I didn't forget the dytes. Ye know, that was the rarest enjoyment I ever had. Ye don't think so? Try it once! Why, God blyme me, there's a chance for imagination in it, and genius and art—highest kind of art. For instance now, I'd squat down in front of a blank headboard and think a bit, and the inspiration would come, and I'd write like this, maybe: 'Jno. K. Boggart, of New Zealand. Born Dec. 21, 1870; died June 5, 1890,' and then, underneath, 'He Rests in Peace'; or else, 'Elsie, Youngest Daughter of Mary B. and William H. Terhune; b. May 1st, 1880; d. Nov. 25, 1889 — Not Lost, but Gone Before'; or agyne, 'Lucas, Lieutenant T. V. Killed in Battle at Wady Halfa, Egypt, August 30, 1889; born London, England, Jan. 3, 1850—He Lies Like a Warrior, Tyking His Rest with His Martial Cloak Around Him'; or something humorous, as 'Bohunkus, J. J.; born Germany, Oct. 3d, 1880; died (by request) Cape Town, Sept. 4, 1890'; or one that I remember as my very best effort, that read, 'Willie, Beloved Son of Anna and Gustave Harris; b. April 1st, 1878; d. May 5th, 1888 — He Was a Man Before His Mother.' Then I wrote me own nyme, with the epitaph, 'More Sinned Against Than Sinning;' and the Grad's, too. His motto, I remember, was 'He Pulled 5 in His 'Varsity's Boat.'

"Well, I had more sport that afternoon than I've ever had since. Y'know I felt as if I really were acquainted with all those people—with John Boggart, and Lieutenant Lucas, and Bohunkus, and Willie, and all. Ah, that was a proper experience. But right in the middle of me work here comes a telephone message from town: 'Body of dead baby found at mouth of city sewer—prepare gryve at once.' Well, I dug that gryve, the first, last and only gryve I ever hope to dig. It came on to rain like a water-spout, and oh, but it was jolly tough work. Then about four o'clock, just as I was finishing, the Grad. comes home, howling drunk. I see him go into the shack, and pretty soon out he comes, with a hoe in one hand and a table leg in the other. Soon as ever he sees me he makes a staggering run at me, swinging the hoe and the table leg and yelling like a Zulu indaba. Just to make everything agreeable and appropriate, I was down in the gryve, and it occurred to me that the situation was too uncommon convenient. I scrambled out and made a run for it, for there was murder in the Grad's eye, and for upwards of ten minutes we two played blindman's buff in that gryveyard, me dodging one headboard to another, and he at me heels, chivying me like a fox and with intent to kill. All at once he trips over a headboard, and goes down and can't get up, and at the same minute here comes the morgue wagon over Hospital Hill.

"Now here comes the queer part of this lamentable history. A trap was following that morgue wagon, a no-end swell trap, with a cob in the shafts that was worth an independent fortune. There was an Old Gent in the trap and a smart Cape boy driving. The old Gent was the heaviest kind of a swell, but I'd never seen him before. The morgue wagon drives into the yard, and I—the Grad. being too far gone—points out the gryve. The driver of the morgue wagon chucks out the coffin, a bit of a three-foot box, and drives back to town. Then up comes the trap, and the Old Gent gets down—dressed up to the nines he was, in that heartbreaking rain—and says he, 'My man, I would like to have that coffin opened.' By this time the Harvard Grad. had pulled himself together. He staggered up to the Old Gent and says, 'No, can't op'n no coffin, 'tsgainst all relugations—all regalutions, can't permit no coffin tobeopp'n.' I wish you could have seen the Old Gent. Excited! The man was shaking like a flagstaff in a gyle, talked thick and stammered, he was so phased. Gawd strike me, what a scene! I can see it now—that pauper burying ground way down there in South Africa—no trees, all open and bleak. The pelting ryne, the open gryve and the drunken Harvard Grad., and the excited Old Swell arguing over a baby's coffin.

Pretty soon the Old Gent brings up a sovereign and gives it to the Grad.

" 'Let her go,' says the Grad., and with that he gives the top board of the coffin such a kick as started it an inch or more. With that—now listen to what I'm telling—with that the Old Gent goes down on his knees in the mud and muck, and kneels there waiting and fair gasping with excitement while the Harvard Grad. wrenches off the topboard. Before he had raised it four inches me Old eGnt plunges his hand in quick, gropes there a second and takes out something—something shut in the palm of his hand.

" 'That's all,' says he. 'Thank you, my men,' and gives us a quid apiece. We stood there like stuck swine, dotty with the queerness, the horribleness of the thing.

" 'That's all,' he says again, with a long breath of relief, as he climbs into his trap with his clothes all foul with mud. 'That's all, thank God.' Then to the Cape boy: 'Drive her home, Jim.' Five minutes later we lost him in the blur of the rain over Hospital Hill."

"But what was it he took out of the baby's coffin?" said half a dozen men in a breath at this point. "What was it? What could it have been?"

"Ah, what was it?" said Miller. "I'll be damned if I know what it was. I never knew, I never will know."

A comparison of the average height of men in various trades and professions in different countries brings out the fact that the English, as a nation, are the tallest men in the world. It has been found that the English professional classes, who are the tallest adult males, average 5 feet 9¼ inches. Next on the list come the males of all classes of the United States. Most European nations average for the adult male 5 feet 5 inches, but the Austrians, Spaniards, and Portuguese fall a trifle short of this standard.

BIRTHDAY OF AN OLD MISSION

Mission San Juan Celebrates Its Hundredth Anniversary.

They have been celebrating down at San Juan of late, celebrating the founding of the old Mission there, with all the customary parades and reviews, and "floats" and orations and fireworks. The ancient little town is in a state of excitement, the like of which it has never known before. It was built there nearly one hundred years ago, which is ancient history as things go in California. Prior even to that time the old Mission had been erected and durably so, to boot, the walls being some four feet thick and constructed of adobe and burnt bricks. It is a thousand pities that the picturesque tiled roof has been removed and supplanted by the ugly modern affair. However, the walls and interior have remained intact, and are of more interest to the antiquarian and the amateur of the early California archaeology and architecture than perhaps any other Mission in the State.

San Juan is not only picturesque and interesting; it has an historic value as well. Adjoining the Mission church is the inevitable plaza, quite a huge affair, nearly 400 feet square. More than one review and muster has been held here where the troops—American and Spanish alike—have gone forth to battle and sudden death, while in the foothills just behind the town itself is shown the spot where Fremont unfurled the Stars and Bars and claimed the country for the United States.

Quite the feature of the celebration was the Spanish supper, served in the corridors of the old Mission itself, an idea that was as charming as it was novel and effective. The long tables were loaded down with tortillas, frijoles, enchillados, and the like, and the guests waited upon by the young girls of the town, who, for the occasion, masqueraded in the Spanish costumes of the early forties. The procession was peculiarly successful and under the charge of Grand Marshal Flint made a tour of the town without let or hindrance or a moment's unnecessary delay. The "floats" representing the ancient Spanish life of the place were most unique, and took the fancy of the crowd from the very start. High mass was said in the Mission church after the parade by Bishop Montgomery, who also delivered a very forcible address on the founding and purposes of the Missions.

The Mission of San Juan was organized in 1797, and the work upon the present building was commenced in 1803 by the missionary fathers, Catala, Martiarena and Tasuere. It was the fifteenth Mission started in California by priests traveling northward from Mexico, and it was not long before it had attained a great degree of prosperity. No better field for a mission could be found than in this particular valley, which, at that time, could boast of twenty-three Indian villages or rancherios and a native population of over a thousand. There are hardly more than a handful of these native Indians left at this time, yet they are still faithful to the Mission fathers and took part in the parade. One very curious feature of the "Jubilee' was an ancient Indian woman over 100 years old, who is still a devout worshiper in the Mission, and who was actually alive and present at the time of its foundation.

The Mission prospered well during the early years of the century. In 1800 the number of converts was 641, which, two years later, had increased to nearly 1,000—all Indians. Now, although the old building has practically outlived its usefulness, it is still in an excellent state of preservation, and there is no reason to suppose that it will not last for another hundred years, attractive as an interesting bit of archaeology, if not as the headquarters of a vigorous and influential order of friars.

The accompanying set of photographs, illustrative of the day's festivities, are from the studio of W. G. Jefferson, of Hollister, who was "on the spot at the time," and succeeded in making some very good shots.

LONDON DAY BY DAY

Aftermath of Jubilee Week in the World's Metropolis.

People in London are beginning to think that Barney Barnato's death was something like his life. Barney went up like the rocket and came down like the proverbial stick. Everything was sensational about this little man. The mystery of his birth, his early means of livelihood, his phenomenal rise to wealth and power and his mid-ocean suicide. Of a Tuesday, his taking off was the only subject in the mouth of London, Wednesday it was merely a sensation, suddenly on Thursday the whole matter was forgotten, and Barney and his millions were promptly relegated to the domain of episodes. They say some unkind things of the Kaffir King nowadays. His wealth, it is reported, was absolutely wasted upon him! to the end he remained a sneaking, treacherous, totally untrustworthy little beast, sordid, narrow, mean of taste, low of desire, precisely the same man that once sold shoestrings in the London purlieus.

It is only since his death that his real character has become apparent. Those that knew Barney best, that knew him for what he was, were precisely the men who could not afford to speak their minds and opinions because of intimate business relations with the ex-circus clown, the one-time peddler, the inveterate drunkard. Truly a nasty little beast, the world is well rid of him.

The Jubilee is over and done with at last, and now that the fun of the show is all past, one begins to overhear comment and criticism, especially criticism. It was not altogether an unmixed blessing, this Jubilee business, when all is said and done. Pervading everything that went forward was a vague, hardly defined sense of terror. The intangible feeling of dread that detaches itself from things that are vast, huge, and ungovernable, from a crowd of nine millions of people, for instance. But London is beginning to breathe easy again and with returning breath comes articulate speech, speech that is seasoned with complaint. It seems that much of the Jubilee was horribly mismanaged. The bull, relative to the cards of invitation for the American Embassy, is, of course, stale news by now. But the latest blunder, or series of blunders, is in connection with the reception of the Colonial troops. They came from the four corners of the world—otherwise the British Empire—and were largely made up of volunteers who paid their own expenses. When they at last reached London, no attention was paid to them by the war office. They came in at dark and deserted docks and stations, at all sorts of uncanny hours, and found no one to meet or to greet them, and no preparations made for their entertainment in the unfamiliar metropolis.

They were obliged to grope their way about London looking for barracks of which they knew but the name. You can fancy what remarks would be made on such occasion by sleepy subalterns from Ceylon, let us say, or Guiana, accustomed to be regarded as quite important personages in their little posts and garrisons. Not until the complaints of these unfortunates had begun to echo from one end of London to the other did the war office bestir itself. The most exasperating feature of the affair—to English minds—was the contrast of this style of reception with that accorded to the "ancient and honorables" at the time of their visit.

The admiralty was not much better than the war office. Fancy the authorities forgetting to make arrangements for the Colonial troops to see the naval review at Spithead. The torrent of frenzied protests this stupidity created elicited from the admiralty only the gracious permit to view the fleet four days after the review. "And you know," said the admiralty, soothingly, "you can see the ships to much better advantage when there is no crowd." Which remark did not tend to make the Colonials feel any better.

It is not often that England imitates America—more's the pity. The Duchess of Devonshire, however, has taken her cue from Mrs. Bradley-Martin and is to give a fancy dress ball on almost exactly the same lines as those which characterized the New York lady's function. The haute noblesse, of course, is to be there in full force, led by the Prince of Wales. It was understood at the outset that the Prince would attend the affair in the costume of Henry IV. of France. But he has changed his mind of late, since the Queen discouraged the idea, representing to him the lack of dignity in his assumption of the character of a foreign monarch. Now he is to appear as a simple Knight of Malta. The women are quarreling, so they say, more than they did over the Bradley-Martin affair. They all want to be queens—it's really very funny—and as the number of queens is limited, some of them must be left out. These must be content to follow in the train of their royal mistresses as court ladies of the period. How Mrs. Bradley-Martin will appear is not definitely stated. It is known, however, that she saved a good thousand dollars on her Jubilee seat. Bradley-Martin, Jr., was lucky enough to draw a seat at one of the windows of the Bachelors' Club, of which he is a member, which same seat he dutifully presented to his mamma. Strangely enough, Mrs. Bradley-Martin occupied it alone, no member of her family being near her.

Filial regard is not extinct in South London. A young man charged with hitting a woman over the head with a beef bone, explained that she had been fighting from 5 o'clock in the morning till noon with his mother, and that he thought it time to stop it. A policeman testified that in the same street two women once fought all day long, stopping only for meals, till one went home and died. Her husband had looked on, calmly mending shoes, while the fight went on.

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out

I wonder, dearest Diary, whether my confidences will be of sufficient interest this week to warrant their existence. To please, according to our oracle, Aunt Sibyl, is our one excuse for being, and where we fail to do that we become as salt that has lost its savor. But your pages are alluring, and in these warm days when the sun beats down and the wind becomes a caressing zephyr temptation takes the form of a clump of trees, a cosey hammock well stretched, and, in lieu of a man, a sympathetic diary.

To the maiden in search of interesting amusement this is certainly an unsatisfactory answer. In the first place society is so scattered. Numbers of girls everywhere but no gathering of cliques as is the usual thing. Last week I went up to Aunt Elinor's ranch in the Sonoma valley and found various families there enjoying the country life, the hay rides and the fruit. The Hutchinsons had a houseful of young people, and the Havens expect to have house parties all through July. You know there is a hotel at Agua Caliente with a mineral spring, and a goodly portion of the southern element is ensconced there. I saw there the Van Wyck crowd. You know they gave such jolly dances during the winter. Uncle Harry, who has been wandering about like the proverbial lion seeking, not whom he can devour, but merely what waters will suit his specific complaint, finds many maidens at each of the different springs. It seems to be fashionable to take the "waters" this year, but as no particular waters were dictated society wanders whither it listeth.

Aunt Sibyl and Mabel go to Santa Cruz for July. I hear of quite a few girls who are to be there—Julia Crocker and Emma Butler among the number. When the W. E. Deans, the Dutards, the Nesmiths and a flock of people from the southern portion of the State are at the Vendome in San Jose. The weather has been [illegible] and pleasant. They [illegible] time. Wheeling, riding and driving. I am very fond of San Jose, as one can live an active life there and yet be as lazy as one desires.

On Friday night Mabel, Leila and I went to the Presidio hop. It was a lively affair, but chiefly [illegible] for the extreme youth of the girls. I hardly saw one maid whose social experiences numbered even one winter, but all next year's buds were in evidence. Marie Wells, Kathro Burton, Charlotte Ellinwood, etc. You have no idea how difficult it is to find an escort to go to the Presidio dances. The men absolutely detest them. Arthur says there is nothing strange in that when one considers everything. In the first place the girls are apt to forget their escorts when the arrive and just dance with the officers. Arthur is very ingenuous in some ways, and he can not understand why a fellow should not be perfectly frank about expressing his feelings.

On Saturday I went to San Rafael to stay until Monday, and had a capital time. The paper chase was really exciting, and I was splendidly mounted and came in near the front. I hope to be a hare before the season closes if only papa will get me that thoroughbred. He is such a dreadful procrastinator, though, I just have to coax and beg, and beg and coax. I wish I had money of my own. Should I not make it fly! There was a little dance in the evening that was quite lively. But, my dear, there were few girls and less men, and those not of the dancing order. The place teems with young married people, who, however interesting they may be to one another do not prove particularly fascinating to an unattached maiden such as yours truly. They are so awfully happy, too, which, if anything, increases their dullness to the looker-on. It it not funny, but quarrelsome couples are always more interesting? I suppose it is like yachting. a quiet sea becomes very monotonous, but when one is always on the look-out for sudden squalls it becomes a matter of some moment. I wish, however, that some one would take Ed Greenway's place and organize regular entertainments. That is, I think, the reason of the extreme quietude of the season. Every one is willing to follow, none to lead. If only some young fellow would get in and start things. I wish I were a man. I should try my hand at social manoeuvering, and I know I should become the darling of the town, the envy of every Brownie. If Louis Bruguiere were only grown up he might do. My impression is that if some one would get in and be entertainer in chief things might be made hum in San Rafael. You see we have everything but an organizer, and like sheep without a shepherd, the flock disperseth.

I am going on a hay ride up to the Bancroft's ranch over the Fourth, and expect a lively time. Leila is to be at San Rafael, and is muchly excited over the tournament. Mabel has gone to Monterey to stay with the Breezes. And now, dearest Diary, farewell. From your loving

The first event of the season at San Rafael was the paper chase on Saturday, to which allusion is made elsewhere. It was followed in the evening by a ball,which gathered in the young people of the surrounding country. Summer in California is not the best time for dancing, and there were rather more lookers-on than dancers, though some very swell gowns were worn and an air of festivity pervaded the institution. The heroine of the occasion was of course Miss Gardie McFarland of Honolulu, who had so handily won the chase. Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels was in white crepe over pink silk, trimmed with accordion pleated insertions over Valencienne lace. Mrs. Crooks wore a skirt of lace flounces with a gray chiffon waist. Mrs. Nuttall wore a white satin waist, the skirt covered with Duchesse lace. Mrs. Wm. Fries was in red liberty chiffon over red satin. Miss Hager was in white and pink organdie and pink ribbon, with trimmings of D'Alencon lace. Miss Mills wore organdie and white lace. Miss Julia Crocker was in blue organdie with pink flowers, blue ribbons and insertions of white lace. Miss Kipp wore a white satin skirt and waist covered with yellow chiffon. Miss Marie Kipp was in light blue organdie with white lace. Among the prettiest girls present were the Misses Oge of San Rafael, who were daintily gowned in white and pink.

After the ball there was a general adjournment to the clubhouse, where numerous suppers were served. The water tower, which is a characteristic feature of the San Rafael landscape, has been converted at last to a useful purpose. In the lower story a comfortable supper room has been fashioned, in which there is a piano for the use of the guests. Connected with the room is a grill, over which there presides one of Gobey's celestial chefs, a past master in the gentle art of making Welsh rarebits. I believe that there are not many summer hotels in the United States where such an excellent thing in rarebits can be had as those now available at San Rafael. It certainly does not detract from the attractiveness of the place. The new grill room had its formal inauguration the other night when Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels invited a number of young people to supper there. Mrs. Paxton and Miss Mills sang. At the same time Mrs. Barfield had a large party of more elderly people at another table. By the way, the latest additions to the summer colony at San Rafael are Mr. and Mrs. Tay, who are installed in one of the Dodge cottages.. On Wednesday Mr. and Mrs. Frank Johnson had a dinner at their home in San Rafael, at which they entertained quite a number of young people.

Attention is concentrated of course on the tennis tournament which began yesterday. This afternoon and Monday, however, will be the important days of the tournament, and on the fifth there is sure to be a big gathering. In the evening the annual ball will undoubtedly prove a great success.

No special arrangements for celebrating the Fourth have been made at Burlingame. Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hobart have issued a general invitation to the county to celebrate the national birthday in the grounds of their pretty home.. A programme of athletic sports has been arranged, and it is probable that the Burlingamites and others will assemble there. At Menlo, where quite a number of welll known families are installed in their country houses, the day will be individually celebrated. The Ed. Hopkins have a house party, finishing up with a dance Monday night. The Eyres are to have a big luncheon on Monday, and similar entertainments will take place in other houses. There will be polo at Burlingame on Saturday and the usual gathering at the clubhouse on Sunday. The tennis game at San Rafael on Monday will be a great attraction for the young people.

President Eels has taken charge of affairs at the University Club with a strong hand, and the policy he has inaugurated ought to make an excellent showing at the end of the next fiscal year. A very intelligent move is the announcement of a change in the management of the ladies' department. During the summer months the restaurant has been run at a serious loss. Its operations are now partially suspended, but whoever desires to dine or sup there is privileged to do so by notifying the steward a day in advance, when proper arrangements will be made. This will make a big saving in provisions and other things.

One never realizes the absolute emptiness of Oakland until the latter days of June. Then everything ceases, there is a dearth of incident and the sole happenings of the week are the goings and comings of the Sunday pleasure seekers. The informal bicycle party becomes a dream of the past and the Haywards Clubhouse is patronized by city people. This season very few Oaklanders have sought the larger resorts. De. Monte has yet to see the influx of Alamedans that in former years filled its halls. The Folgers are in San Rafael. The Requas and Langs are still in Piedmont. Mrs. L. A. Booth is anticipating the arrival of her daughter, Mrs. Charles Phelps, and Miss Elinore Phelps from New York. Mr. and Mrs. A. A. More, with a party of young people, are at their ranch in San Jose, and nearly all the Deux Temps crowd are at their ranches scattered over the country.

Few people seem to draw as much unalloyed pleasure out of life as the Hush family. They always find some way of making time pass agreeably. Recently a party of them left San Francisco in a big coach for Lake Tahoe. They were amply provisioned, and carried all the impedimenta for making both day and night comfortable. They anticipate remaining away about a month.

Miss Ethel Moore, who left last March on a trip around China and Japan, is expected home about the twenty-fifth of July. Miss More travelled all over Japan in a jinricksha, and has seen more points of interest than usually falls to the lot of the tourist.

A very jolly yachting party was given by Miss Ada English in honor of her sister, Mrs. John Irwin of Mare Island. The party left early in the morning and sailed up to the island. On their arrival a capital luncheon was served on the houseboat Independence, which was prettily decorated in flags, flowers, etc. They had a good band, and the young people had a merry time. About fifty participated, chiefly the members of the younger set.

Mrs. L. L. Bromwell gave a smart little dinner on Thursday in honor of her son Mr. Percy Bromwell. The house was prettily decked with branches of roses, and after dinner the young people played cards. Among them were Miss Pauline Fore, Miss Genevieve Fore, Misses Florence and Blanche Sharon, Miss Hale and Miss Gertrude Allen, Messrs, Brayton, Rosborough, Belden, Herbert Beck and Harry Farr.

A garden fete is to be given at the home of Mrs. Fisher in Haywards next Thursday afternoon for the benefit of the Haywards library.

Miss Jessie Coleman made an unusually striking bride, and her gown of white satin regulation length and trimmed with duchess lace, was strikingly made, and showed off her figure to decided advantage. From a point of view of originality there is nothing to say. The ceremony did not differ in one particular from the usual, and one home wedding is singularly like unto another. The ceremony took place beneath an arch of sweet peas, two little maids, cousins of the bride, daintily gowned in white frocks served as ribbon bearers.

THE FIRST PAPER CHASE

Opening of the Hunting Season at San Rafael.

Such a gay gathering at the Hotel Rafael last Saturday afternoon—equipages of all the varieties found in the dealers' catalogue, fine horses, pretty girls in riding habit, men in appropriate equestrian garb—all ready for the first paper chase of the season. On the piazzas scores of spectators in summer raiment gazing out on the confusion of carriages and horses crowded into the gravelled terrace in front of the hotel. Decidedly a brilliant array, pervaded with excitement, moving with the ebb and flow of preparation, the rushing hither and thither of hares and hounds, the arrival of new carriages, the passing of spectators. Of course paper chases are not held every day, and there was much expectation over this, that inaugurated the season and afforded a veritable sensation of interest far beyond the milder joys of tennis or golf.

The natural tendency is to compare paper chases with their predecessors. This is legitimate, and affords a welcome opportunity for declaring the superiority of the latest development. Not only was there a larger but also a more enthusiastic gathering of riders than that at last year's chases. The arrangements were capital. Mr. J. J. Crooks and Ward McAllister had consummated the preparations and Frank Johnson, as huntsman, had laid out the course. The hares, Miss Warburton and Dr. Howitt, were given fifteen minutes and led an easy route through the Coleman tract, thence up over the ridge to the west of the Petaluma road, from there across the marsh and through the Porta Suelo, and then to a finish in a meadow a few miles north of the hotel. There was a stiff breeze blowing, which rather scattered the paper, but the hounds followed the chase with lots of energy and rode the course valiantly, taking all obstructions with alacrity. The finish, as is shown in the photograph on page 4, was spectacular. Miss McFarland of Honolulu, who rode astride, as is the custom of the Hawaiian kingdom, led the field in brilliant style, and next after her followed Hugh Hume, F. Farnsworth, Miss Crowley, Mrs. Crooks and Frank Johnson. They had all made a gallant ride of it—by no means without incident, though nothing of serious import occurred. The silver cups were awarded to Miss McFarland, who was liberally cheered for her bold riding, and to Hugh Hume, whose hunter made the running in fine style. Altogether the chase was a great success, and it is to be hoped that the subsequent meets will be equally satisfactory.

The following took part in the chase as hounds: Miss Alice Hager, S. Pardee, Dr. G. F. Shiels, Miss Della Davidson, Miss Mary Kipp, James Swinnerton, Baldwin Wood, Ward McAllister, Frank S. Johnson, Miss McFarland, E. Finnigan, R. E. Warfield, A. J. Dibblee, L. H. Allen, S. H. Boardman, Miss Crowley, T. J. Crowley, George F. Page, E. Evans, J. Parkin, Hugh Hume, Alfred F. Hollman, F. Farnsworth, A. Folger, F. Hankin.

The grand concert to be given by "C. E. Chorus" on Tuesday evening next will be a fitting inaugural for the big convention which is to follow.

The chorus is 1,000 strong, and will be reinforced for the occasion by one hundred or more of the best soloists of the city.

The programme embraces some of the best selections from the masters, and all in all will be an event one should not miss. Besides, it will afford an early opportunity to see what the hall committee has accomplished in the way of an auditorium. The transformation of the pavilion is indeed a revelation.

Seats are on sale at 112 Post street, and we understand will be withdrawn to-night.

There's to be a Letter Carriers' picnic at Schuetzen's Park, San Rafael, which promises to be one of the events of the Fourth of July. These industrious servitors of the mail have organized the affair on an elaborate scale, and propose to devote the proceeds to entertaining the visiting delegates to the Eighth Annual Convention, which will be held here in September. Quite a number of useful and valuable articles have been contributed, which are to be utilized as gate prizes.

Mr. Frank Davey, so long identified with Taber's Photograph Gallery, has established the Davey Photograph Co. in Honolulu. He has just made a tour of the islands securing negatives, and he obtained some excellent pictures of out of the way regions seldom visited even by ambitious amateurs. Among his latest views are new pictures of the volcano Kilauea, of which an eruption is expected. Tourists desiring to obtain views could not do better than write to the Davey Co.

Favorite Brand of Champagne.

Speaking of champagnes, the Moet & Chandon brand appears to be the favorite among swelldom. Unaided by the influence of caterers and leaders so frequently employed, Moet & Chandon appears to have captured New York cultured society. The brand was exclusively served at the Patriarchs' ball, Washington Gridiron Club (banquet of international repute), New Year party of O. H. P. Belmont, and at the famous Bradley-Martin costume ball.—Hotel Gazette.

A. Schilling & Co.'s competitions are being watched with interest. Finding that the grocers, and not the consumers, captured $200 in prizes for sending in the largest number of "Schilling's Best" tickets, they duplicated the payment and gave $100 each to two of the largest consumers. This liberality is not being overlooked by the public in the big missing word competition which the firm are now conducting.

Fourth of July Half-Rate Excursions to Haywards Park.

The Haywards Electric Motor train will leave Fruitvale Station at 12:50 p.m., on the arrival of the 12 m. Broad Gauge Local from San Francisco, on Saturday, Sunday and Monday, returning from the Park at 5:30 p.m. There will be a concert on the verandas of the clubhouse every afternoon and Saturday evening. Mrs. Hayward, the proprietress of the clubhouse, has made elaborate preparations for holiday entertainments.

MISS SABEL'S HUSBAND

A Vicarious Interview, with Occasional Intrusions by the Subject.

I saw Miss Sabel in a room about as big as a trunk in which had been placed a trunk about as big as a room. So you might call it a tete-a-tete affair. (Observe I say "you" might call it tete-a-tete. I wouldn't. Her husband was there.)

The profile of Miss Sabel

Said I: "I want to say before anything else how much I'm delighted with your act, Miss Sabel. I—"

"Thank you," said Mr. Sabel. "Yes, it takes everywhere.

Miss Sabel spread her short skirt very carefully and sat down. I found a seat on the trunk.

"I'm not surprised that it should take. I'd like to know one thing, Miss Sabel, are you French or American?

Miss Sabel cleared her throat and opened her lips.

"I—"

"She was born in this country," interrupted Mr. Sabel, "of French parents."

"Oh, yes. I see. Well, now, Miss Sabel, those songs of yours. How is it you manage to throw into them such dash, such fire, such vivacity?"

"I—"

"That," said Mr. Sabel, "is just a matter of study and practice. We go over a song word by word, line by line, till every little detail and gesture is perfect."

"It must be very fatiguing in the end," I hazarded, turning to the little songstress again.

"Oh, I—"

"Not in the least," said Mr. Sabel. "Miss Sabel would rather work than eat."

"Are you so fond of singing as all that?"

"Yes; I—"

"You may say that Miss Sabel has played the largest engagement of any vaudeville star in the United States. Why, she was at Hammerstein's Olympia three consecutive months."

"Were you, indeed. It's a wonder you didn't break down. Miss Sabel, you ought to take a rest."

"She never rests. In two years and a half she has rested six weeks."

"Where do you get your songs, Miss Sabel, and how?" I asked, desperately.

"Well, you see—"

"She never sings a song that's been sung anywhere before. 'Somebody Loves Me,' for instance. She got that in MS. straight from the author. She made the song and the song made her."

"Now," said I, 'that one, 'Hot Times in the Old Town To-Night,' that's a ripping good song. Is it your favorite?"

"Oh, I like—"

"Oh, she likes them all. But 'Hot Times' is as popular' as any. Then there's 'Somebody Loves Me,' and 'Remus Takes the Cake,' and 'Bye-Bye, Belinda,' and the 'Faded Leaf of Shamrock'—all popular."

"You know what I like so much about your singing, Miss Sabel, is that you seem to be having such a good time yourself, and you laugh at your own jokes in a way that's quite irresistible, that takes your audience right off their feet. Now tell me do you really enjoy it so much as you seem to, or is that part of the game?"

"Oh, that," began Mr. Sabel, but I resolutely held my face from him, trained my glance at Miss Sabel as though I were aiming a machine gun. Mr. Sabel went on talking steadily, but in the interstices of his words I managed to make out that Miss Sabel was saying:

"No, I really enjoy it; there's something in an audience, you know—

"—Just a matter—(from Mr. Sabel.)

"—that carries one away,

"—of study and practice.

"—that sort of hypnotizes you;

"—We go over a song

"—that sort of hypnotizes you and exhilarates you,

"—word by word,

"—makes you excited.

"—line by line,

"—Why, it's not so much I who have magnetism over an audience

"—till every little detail

"—as the audience has

"—and gesture

"—magnetism over me.

"Quite an idea,' said I to Miss Sabel, and "hard work will tell" to Mr. Sabel. Then to Miss Sabel again:

"Where do you go from here, Miss Sabel?"

"We go," began Mr. Sabel—

"We will go to Salt Lake City and Denver," broke in Miss Sabel—

"And—"

This is Miss Sabel as she sings a lullaby

But she had her head now and went on in spite of him.

"I'll take a company from here—from the Orpheum—

"And—

"and tour the West with them—

"and—

"and disband in Denver, I think."

"What then, Miss Sabel?"

"She," began Mr. Sabel—

"I am going on with Hallen," interrupted his wife.

"She—

"It is to be 'Sabel, Hallen and Fuller.' "

"I only wish," said I, "that I could have got a lot of photographs of you in costume, Miss Sabel."

"Well, she—

"It's so hard to keep photographs," she said, pathetically. "Everybody takes them from you." I had been maneuvering toward the door for some time past and just about here managed to take myself off. I went away with an impression of a very charming little woman, indeed. Josephine Sabel is not what you would call pretty, but she is French to her fingers and toes, which is much better. She can do precisely what she ilkes with her audiences—making them laugh or weep or whistle at her will. But if she's so fascinating to an audience, think what must she be when it comes to one man—if she cared to try. I know one man she can try it on—but, there, one forgets that there is a husband.

Frank Worthing as the Genteel Highwayman — Plays to Come.

The idea of "A Social Highwayman" is altogether impossible—that of a man of mental and moral excellence engaged in the very low work of stealing from his friends, but it reads well in the novel and equally interesting is it in the play. Courtice Jaffrey is very much a villain, but gains sympathy in the beginning for his handsome rooms and finally for his efforts to rise to better things.

Mr. Frank Worthing, Mr. Frederick Perry and Miss Eleanor Moretti may be said to be the features of the play as presented by the Frawley Company, and it may also be said that it is one of the very best presentations the Frawley Company has ever given. The settings of the stage have been well selected and well arranged, and all the little details carefully looked to. But to get back to the players. Mr. Worthing is the gentlemanly robber, and the part fits him quite well—as well as anything in which he has yet been seen. Comparisons with Mansfield or to Holland may be invited, but such comparisons should hardly be considered; we have had neither Mansfield nor Holland in the part, and likely never shall, and it really doesn't matter if we don't. Mr. Worthing is our only quantity—let him be sufficient thereof. Jenkins Hanby is a clever character, and Mr. Frederick Perry gives it clever coloring; he gathers interest to himself all through the play, and in the final scene the outburst over his dead friend sounds like a despairing voice in the night. Miss Eleanor Moretti as Senora Lelia Caprices is very dramatic—altogether the very dramatic person Senora Lelia Caprices should be. She makes a splendid appearance and wears some remarkable gowns.

Apropos of gowns—the ladies in the play are all well gowned—Miss Busby, as Her Grace of Clayborough, comes on in veritable visions. But every sight of Miss Busby, pretty, very pretty as she is, brings up thoughts of a much prettier and very much darker haired girl who played with Chauncey Olcott. It is the same Miss Busby—but la chevelure—it is not the same! Blanche Bates has little to do as Elinor Burnham, but does it sweetly and with simple grace. Miss Phosa McAllister as Mrs. Deane, the medium, has a ghastly make-up and deserves a good word for her uncanny scene.

The production of "Captain Paul" at Morosco's next week, beginning with a Monday matinee, will introduce two new people, Ulric B. Collins, the Dodor of the original "Trilby" company, and F. W. Strong, who has been stage manager with Charles Frohman for the past eight years. "Captain Paul" is a romantic naval play by Edward E. Rose, and is of the period just following the war of the revolution. It is a costume play and a little out of the regular run of melodrama. There is some very pretty scenery at Morosco's this week in the Kentucky drama "Blue Grass"—the ruins of an old chruch by moonlight and effective prison exterior. The play itself is interesting and dramatic, the lynching scene being exceptionally realistic. Maud Edna Hall plays Mary Brand, a part she created in the original production, and plays it well, with engaging manners and tearful emotions. Lorena Atwood has little to do as the repentant adventuress, but does it cleverly—her death struggle is one of the best things in the performance. Mortimer Snow has the double advantage of a good appearance and a good voice, which he manages well as the hero. John J. Pierson always a good villain, but this week seems to be better than usual.

H. S. K.

Next week will be the ninth and last of "The First Born" at the Alcazar. This clever little drama has had a remarkable run and could doubtless run with profit for some time to come, but must be withdrawn owing to road engagements, which will be filled with the original company. The play preceding the Chinese play will be the rattling comedy, "A Victim of Circumstances," an adaptation from the French in three acts. Miss Selene Johnson, who has been with Charles Frohman and A. M. Palmer, will make her first appearance as leading lady. She is said to be a beautiful woman and an able actress, and will doubtless become popular. Mr. George Trader, a favorite at the Alcazar some years ago, and now under engagement to Minnie Maddern Fiske for next season, and secured for next season by Manager Belasco, will also be in the cast. A special holiday matinee is announced for Monday.

Another costume play, "The Mayflower," will be given by the Lyceum Company at the Baldwin Tuesday evening, Monday being devoted, matinee and evening, to special performances of "The Prisoner of Zenda." The story of "The Mayflower" is pretty and graceful, set in quaint scenes and full of quaint color. It begins in Holland, continues in England, and finally concludes on the shore of Massachusetts Bay near Plymouth Rock. James K. Hackett is cast as Lord Gervase Carew, an English nobleman, who makes love under an assumed name to the Puritan girl Joan Mallory (Mary Mannering). This is a part in which she acts agreeably, and is fair to look upon. The cast includes Messrs. Walcott, Morgan, Wheelock, Elizabeth Tyree, Grace Root and Mrs. Thos. Whiffen.

The Frawley Company will give two timely performances of "Shenandoah," matinee and evening, on Monday in observance of the national holiday. "The Two Escutcheons" will follow on Tuesday evening and will continue through the week. Theodore Hamilton will be seen as the Baron and Blanche Bates will be the Widow Stevenson, the part played last season by Maxine Elliott. Frank Worthing, Harry Corson Clarke, T. D. Frawley, George Bosworth and Phosa McAllister will all appear in their original roles. John Drew's play, "Christopher, Jr.," will be the next attraction.

To the busy man who wants to make the most of the public holidays the S. F. & N. P. Railroad offers special inducements. A series of excursions to various points on the line have been arranged at reduced rates, so as to enable those who wish to enjoy a few days in the country with their families to travel at the minimum of expense.

MRS. SHERWOOD'S BOOK

Ante-Bellum Recollections of an American Woman.

The literary and social experiences of Mrs. Sherwood form an interesting feature of her book, memoirs entitled "An Epistle to Posterity." (Harper & Brothers, publishers.) During her long and interesting career she had opportunities of meeting most of the great American writers, and she details her little stories of them very pleasantly. She was living in New York when Thackeray was a visitor there, and got to know him well through her friends, the Baxters. Miss Sally Baxter, the daughter of the house, is said to have been the original of Ethel in "The Newcombs." Here is the episode:

Sallie Baxter was a dark beauty of the Spanish type, most exquisitely lovely, with fabulous great black eyes, whose lashes swept her eyebrows. She was a natural unaffected person, and during his stay in New York Thackeray was frequently a guest in her mother's house. Miss Baxter seemed to treat him like a daughter. Perhaps she brought back those dear ones whom he had left at 13 Young street, South Kensington. Many suppers and dinners and theater parties brought me to see the great man rather intimately, and I do not remember a more easy-going and genial person. His tall, commanding form and gray head, his nez retrousse and his eyeglasses, his firm tread and charming laugh, got to be as well known in New York as they were in London. His little notes in his very neat handwriting found their way into our albums. He was always accessible and full of enjoyment, and yet when we saw him sailing along majestically down Broadway, with his hands in his pockets, there was an air of melancholy and of pre-occupation in his expressive face. But he was "reticent as he was brave," and no one heard him speak of his sorrows, if he had any.

Mrs. Sherwood was in Rome while William Waldorf Astor was Minister to Italy. She speaks familiarly of the personality of a distinguished gentleman who has been vulgarly abused by a vulgar press.

With grand parties and excellent dinners, the home of our minister, Mr. W. W. Astor, was a distinguished rallying-place for the Americans. Mr. Astor, speaking all languages, and having a great fortune, could and did live as the representative of our great country ought to live in every foreign city. He was so cultivated and had lived so much in Rome when he was studying art (for he is a good sculptor) that he was also a prince of cicerones. He was just writing his excellent novel of "Valentino," in which, as one of his American critics said, "he had attempted to whitewash the Borgias, and had taken rather a large contract." He did it very well, however.

His beautiful wife, so famous for her Italian eyes, was a great favorite with the Queen, who said that she outshone the Italian beauties in their own style. This gentle creature, so modest and humble, seemed always to be shrinking away from her splendid position, and to care for this earth and its grandeurs very little. Her early, unexpected death seemed to call for Cicero's lament over his daughter.

One mounted gladly the famous marble stairs of the celebrated Palazzo Rospigliosi, with its marble busts of the emperors, to see this home of the Astors.

One of the most interesting reminiscences in the volume is the account of a diner at the Millais mansion in London at which Mrs. Sherwood met a bevy of distinguished persons. She had several letters of introduction to the family of the distinguished artist. However, let her speak for herself.

Lady Millais appointed an hour for me to call, and I found her in her morning room with one of her "Cherry Ripe" daughters. She was a remarkably handsome matron, I thought, and very cordial. She immediately sent for Sir John, who took us in to his painting-room, sat on a table himself, in a boyish fashion, while we looked around the studio, and talked incessantly.

"Will you come and lunch with us informally to-morrow;" said he, "and afterwards we shall give you a dinner. Now, whom do you wish to meet?"

I begged him not to trouble himself about me, that a sight of him and his was all that I expected, and a lunch with the family far more than all I deserved.

But he insisted, and I said at length that I should like to meet Robert Browning. "Oh," said he, "nothing easier; and Fred Leighton, and Mrs. Proctor [Barry Cornwall's widow], and Lord Houghton, and—my dear, you must get the rest" (turning to his wife).

I told Lady Millais that I was in deep mourning and hardly expected to go to a great London dinner-party.

"Oh," said she, kindly, "mourning is always considered full-dress."

Here is the dinner:

The day for the dinner came, and I got in five minutes early, glad to see Lord Houghton in the parlor before Lady Millais came down. We had a quiet chat, and Browning also arriving ahead of time, Lord Houghton introduced him to me. Then came in quite a number of people, Lady Coutts Lindsay among them; she had just been divorced from her husband, Sir Coutts Lindsay, of the "Greenery Yallery, Grosvenor Gallery" fame.

Browning took me in, and I had Lord Houghton on the other side. Opposite me was Mrs. Procter, the oldest queen of the literary coterie in London, and a singular genius; and also vis-a-vis a Mr. Godwin, famous for a mania for buying the chairs of distinguished personages.

Mr. Browning was a great disappointment at first. He looked like a retired ship-captain, was short, rather stout, red-faced, with a large nose and white hair, but he was so simple and kindly and polite that I forgave him for not looking the poet. Very soon he and Mr. Godwin got into a discussion as to the genuineness of a relic. Mr. Godwin said that he had just bought a chair, "the very one in which Mrs. Browning wrote 'Casa Guidi Windows.'" Mr. Browning said that was impossible, for he had never parted with a thing which had been in her apartments.

Mr. Browning was quite agitated about this. Mr. Godwin, however, persevered, and said that the chair was one which Mrs. Browning had given away in her lifetime to certain English friends, two unmarried sisters, who were in Florence with her, or living near her, after the celebrity of the "Casa Guidi Windows" poems, and that they had asked her for it.

Mr. Browning could not dispute this, and fortunately I asked a question about George Eliot, which turned the tables.

Mrs. Procter declared that she "had never called on George Eliot; that she would not have taken a house-maid with such a character."

This brought out Browning and Lord Houghton, who told me many hitherto unknown stories about Thornton Hunt, the supposed lover of the first Mrs. Lewes; of Lewes himself, and of George Eliot, who seemed to have been most generous and self sacrificing in giving up fame and name for Lewes, whom they did not think deserved so much goodness.

An important chapter of the "Epistle to Posterity" is devoted to discussing and describing Washington life, comparing it with the Capital of to-day. Mrs. Sherwood was a personage then, first as the daughter of her father and a friend of the Daniel Webster household, subsequently her own as a grand dame. She tells of the times of President Polk in the following paragraph:

The President's "levees," as we used to call them, were very much smaller than to-day, but they were very like them. I always wonder what we did for light in those days, as oil lamps, always smoky, and candles, always dripping, are all that these splendid affairs had to use in place of the diamond brilliancy of to-day. I once went up-stairs in the White House to search for a pair of overshoes, and I remember there was one candle in that immense hall. I can see now that feeble glimmer.

Mr. Corcoran gave fine dinners; so did the English and French Ministers; but elsewhere I do not remember anything like the luxury of to-day. Indeed, it did not exist, and those who could afford it did not care for it. John Quincy Adams, whose magnificent head was the pride of the House, whose fame made him our first citizen, who was a rich man, lived plainly in rather a Southern fashion. It was a great treat to be permitted to see Mrs. Adams, who had been, as Mr. Everett told me, one of the most admirable hostesses of the White House—her conversation was charming. It was the fashion to be poor in Washington in those days, and I remember the witty Henry A. Wise, who had just then published his clever book, "Los Gringos," when he became engaged to the brilliant Miss Charlotte Everett, saying to his fellow-officers: "Don't be afraid. She is so unlucky as to have some money, but she is a good fellow for all that." What a witty man he was, and how much we enjoyed the suppers at the Mays', of which he was a factor!

Rumors have been current in Constantinople that the warlike tribes of Arabs at the back of Tunis and Algeria have sent many of their chiefs to beg the Sultan to expel the French from the coast of northern Africa. The Islamic party has backed up the movement, and the Sultan has appeared to give encouragement to the suggestion. While of course the French colonies cannot be broken up, an increase of the garrisons may be found needful. This means expense and more of the foreign service which is so distasteful to the peasant soldiers.

THE LYCEUM COMPANY

A Novel in Dramatic Form at the Baldwin.

I prefer to regard "The First Gentleman of Europe" as a novel—a pretty bit of story, admirably told and well interpreted by an even company of players. It is not a drama. The four acts are really four chapters to a romantic novel. Its authors have made no appreciable effort to work up climaxes, or to play harshly or dolefully upon either the sentimental or the heroic side of the audience by means of the artificial or the unnatural or by picturesque, but impossible tableaux. The close of the third act approaches more nearly to the dramatic than any other portion of the play, but it is merely a touch and lingers a few minutes only. This is a remarkable state of affairs in a play laid in the days of knee breeches and wigs and powdered hair. Ordinarily, "anything goes" in the romance of two hundred years ago. Then every gentleman wore a sword, and the ordinary drama of that day, by all the rules dramatic, should have had its duels and its deaths. When Otis Skinner was here, he gave us some fine examples of this ultra sort of thing, but the action of "The First Gentleman of Europe" is more to my liking, it runs in quite a different groove—runs smoothly and placidly along without much to jar upon you in the way of sensation. If the audience is not explosive in its appreciation of the play it does not follow that it lacks appreciation, for the drama does not call for boisterous recognition of its merit. You are expected tto take your enjoyment of it quietly and sensibly. The story of the play is not new. Nobility in love with a commoner's daughter is not a novel theme. It is almost threadbare, but like the story of love itself, though old is ever fresh. That the commoner's daughter who has aroused the passion of nobility should herself be desperately and irrevocably in love with a poor genius whose home is a garret, is not new. And that she should prefer the genius to the gentleman and be faithful to him through poverty and temptation, is something long ago made familiar to us upon the stage, if not in real life. That the discarded mistress of the nobleman shoud plot in court circles to bring the impoverished lovers together and outwit her erstwhile lordly suitor is as old as the stage itself. All of these things, however, do not deter me from pronouncing the play interesting and worth seeing.

I confess to experiencing a little shock at the closing scene of the last act. Daphne, the goldsmith's daughter, to save her lover has consented to yield to the embraces of the prince. I can understand how this First Gentleman of Europe would be moved by Daphne's woe and her devotion to Cartaret; how his pride would be awakened when she gives over to her deep anguish on discovering that the Prince of Wales, who had ever been held in her child's heart as an idol, typical of honor and virtue, was in point of fact but a profligate and debauchee. I can understand that the attitude of Daphne would appeal to any man who possessed a spark of honor, and that to her the Prince might have surrendered in deep contrition, but it is beyond human nature that he should have apologized and humbled himself to Cartaret, who bursts into the room for the purpose of seeking his death. It was not necessary to compel the Prince to go thus far and the wonder of it is that the playwright put him in such a pitiable plight.

Hackett is admirably adapted to the character of Prince George. This man has a manner and a mien that strongly appeal to me. He is buoyant and dashing, and has a face and a pair of eyes that respond to every sentiment. Then, at a moment's notice, he may discard these dashing manners and assume the impressive and severe with equal aptitude. There should be a romance somewhere in the revolutionary period that might be dramatized, with Washington as a young officer for the central figure. Whenever an American playwright hits upon a happy theme in this connection, may he dispose of it to Frohman and may Hackett be cast as the Father of His Country, for he has a face that reminds you of him.

Edward Morgan is not molded in mind or in body for a lover. He is awkwardly tender and manifestly ill at ease in the love scene, but his passionate denunciation of the Prince before that young profligate's face and in the presence of the lords and ladies of the court was rendered with fine spirit and surprisingly good judgment. It brought down the house, and the young man deserved all the plaudits that were vouchsafed to him. Walcott, as the splenetic country baronet, runs Hackett a close race in the affections of the audience. Probably Walcott could do nothing badly.

Miss Mannering, I think, was better cast as Daphne in "The First Gentleman of Europe," than as Flavia in "The Prisoner of Zenda." She was not so gorgeously costumed; indeed, she wore the same gown throughout the play, but her acting was more evenly good. Maud Odell likewise appeared to much better advantage, and handled well the part of Lady Sack, notwithstanding the charge of overacting, which one of the daily critics, I believe, unjustly lays at her door.

Epsom Derby Notes—Sale of Haggin Yearlings—Ingleside Notes.

When one takes up a serious journal like the Saturday Review and finds a three-page article on financial matters opening with the statement that "Galtee More has been the most important topic" of the week under notice, one may be pardoned for some further allusion to the Derby in this column. And here I may mention that, perusing the same journal a few weeks before the event, my eye caught an article headed "Mr. Armstrong on Velasquez." Now, I thought, here is an explanation as to how Lord Rosebery's horse came to be beaten in the Two Thousand Guineas. A little further examination showed that the writer was discoursing of the works of the great painter! One is too apt at times, perhaps, to let matters of sport crowd everything else out of the brain.

The report that Mr. Marcus Daly had cabled Mr. Gubbins an offer for Galtee More was ridiculous on the face of it, though wearing a very circumstantial appearance. A stud master negotiating for a Derby winner would not be likely to take the "man in the street" into his confidence in the initial stages of the transaction.

That Kendal's son Galtee More is a great colt there seems to be no doubt. At the same time, barring Velasquez, he had nothing against him of any merit. It would have made the race much more exciting if Vesuvian and the American colt Berzak had gone to the post, though probably Galtee More held them both safe. Berzak injured his hock in a gallop a few days before the race and had to be scratched. It is worthy of notice that out of the eleven runners two were sired by horses now in California, namely Monterey by imp. Goldfinch, and St. Cloud II by imp. Candlemas.

It is reported that the service fee of Kendal, the sire of the Derby winner, has been fixed at 300 guineas for the future. Galtee More's full brother, Blairfinde, winner of the Irish Derby, has been standing at a very moderate fee at Mr. Gubbin's place in Ireland.

Mr. Haggin has had his proverbial luck in having secured his four representatives of the Bend Or blood, namely, Goldfinch, Golden Garter, Golden Dawn and Order, before the boom had fully set in for that strain, which seems destined to keep the line of Stockwell still to the fore.

The recent successes of the Bend Or blood on the English turf have given rise to much discussion as to the merits of his most famous son, Ormonde, and of the sons of the latter now at the stud, one result of which has been the making of a novel match. The owners of Llanthony and Sorcerer, two of Ormonde's sons now at the stud in England, arranged a "show match," which was to be held on June 19th at the Cobham Stud. Prince Louis Esterhazy, M. Blanc and Captain Machell being amongst the judges selected to decide the competition. Mr. Allison, of the London "Sportsman," is part proprietor of Sorcerer.

Irish bred horses have been wonderfully successful on the English turf this season, having already captured, amongst other important events, the Lincoln Handicap, Grand National Steeplechase, Liverpool Spring Cup, Two Thousand Guineas, Newmarket Stakes Chester Cup and Epsom Derby. This is a remarkable record and is sure to give a great lift to the breeding of thoroughbreds in the Green Isle.

The recent sale of the Rancho del Paso yearlings in New York proved fairly satisfactory. Altogether 58 head were disposed of at an average of $880, a very much higher figure than the average obtained for the produce of any other stud this season. At the same time it must not be overlooked that only a portion of Mr. Haggin's offerings changed hands, the demand for fillies especially being very small and many being sent out of the ring without eliciting bids.

As might have been expected, the get of imp. Goldfinch sold best, the total proceeds of the eight head sired by imp Ormonde's son being about the equivalent of the price Mr. Haggin paid Lord Alington for the horse in England. Two of the Goldfinch youngsters made the top prices of the sale, namely, $8,000 for the colt out of Carina, the dam of Mr. W. O'B. Macdonough's good stallion St. Carlo, and $5,000 for the filly out of Kiss-Me-Quick, by imp. King Ernest. Both lots were taken by Matt Byrnes. For the two colts by imp. Sir Modred, brothers to Dr. Hasbrouck and Comanche, $4,000 and $3,000 were paid respectively, the former going to Mr. P. Lorillard and the latter to Mr. M. Byrnes. Of the total number sold all but 15 were sired by imported stallions. Out of 14 head by Tenny appearing in the catalogue 7 were sold and 2 out of six sired by Salvator, the prices for these being much below the average, with the exception of the colt by Tenny-Loto, which made $1,000. A Fitzjames colt out of the imported Australian mare Harmony realized $1,050, the best price paid for any youngster by an American-bred sire.

The result of the sale affords fresh proof that there is always a good demand for the highest class of stock and that no other sort is wanted. In the tremendous development of thoroughbred breeding of late years this fact has been too often lost sight of. It is quality and not quantity that furnishes satisfactory returns in horse breeding, especially in the case of racing stock. Probably a man with 15 or 20 first-class mares that he could afford to put to the very best stallions, with decent luck and good management would make more money out of his stud than any breeder in the country. At the beginning of this year I drew attention to the fact that one breeder in England had realized $88,885 in 1896 for his entire crop of 12—though the printer unfortunately made the figure 22—yearlings, and I should not be at all surprised if this man made more profit out of this comparatively small production than Mr. Haggin does at Rancho del Paso out of his annual consignment of some 200 head, after allowing a fair rate of interest on the capital invested in stock and establishment in each case.

At a meeting of the stockholders of the Pacific Coast Jockey Club held last week the various officers were re-elected and certain improvements to the Ingleside track approved.

The intentions with regard to stakes next season are not yet known, but the liberal policy hitherto pursued by the management will certainly be adhered to, and the big events, which gave Ingleside so much prestige last year, will no doubt be repeated and possibly added to.

The idea attributed to the Pacific Coast Jockey Club of offering a large stake for an international event in San Francisco has been freely mentioned in the sporting columns of the press throughout the country. Although the notice was in some measure premature, it is very possible that something of the kind may be brought about. Whatever is done, it is, of course, understood that the basis would be weight for age, with probably an allowance to Australian horses in consideration of their later foaling season.

The Spirit of the Times says: "Col. Clay of the Runnymede, has started in to carry out his plan in regard to reducing the production of thoroughbreds. He has already had three fillies operated upon as an experiment. They are doing so well after having the generative organs removed that some more of the troop of fillies will be operated on, and Col. Clay is doing all he can to have his fellow breeders follow suit."

There have been some wonderful sales of polo ponies in London recently. Anything really good has commanded from $750 to $1,250 dollars at public auction, and in one case $2,675 was paid for a very choice pony. The raw article can be bought for anything from $100 to $250, and therefore the enhanced price of the educated mount with an established reputation affords a fine return to the man who can put the finishing touch on a good-mannered, fast pony of the right quality.

MR. BRYAN'S TOUR OF EDUCATION (?)

It matters little, indeed it does not matter at all, if Mr. Bryan, late Democratic candidate for President, is being paid twenty thousand dollars a year and traveling expenses for preaching the doctrine of free silver throughout the United States. He is a poor man and could ill afford to devote his time exclusively to this task without compensation. If the silver mine owners of America, and those individuals who are in agreement with them, choose to set aside a large retaining fee and employ this speaker to travel from State to State advocating a financial doctrine that will bring benefits to them, it at least argues strongly for the earnestness of his employers, and does not of itself cast shadows of doubt on either his patriotism or his earnestness.

Mr. Bryan has reached San Francisco in his Western journey, and already thousands of people have listened to his defense and his advocacy of the cause that met defeat last November. Thoughtful men must read this orator's utterances on the silver question with a mixed feeling of sadness and contempt; sadness, that such altogether meaningless, empty and implausible mouthings should carry weight and favor with any considerable number of our fellow-men; and contempt, that the chosen leader of a great party should deliberately elect to confine himself to cheap, tawdry and unworthy methods. The cause of which Mr. Bryan is the special and professional advocate is most radical, and if adopted would be far-reaching in its effect for good or for bad. Earnest men, wise in the laws of finance and in matters of political economy, strenuously negative all that Mr. Bryan claims, and solemnly and gravely warn us that to engraft his financial theory upon the policy of the nation would not only invite but would precipitate a financial panic that would inevitably result in individual and national disaster, if not in bankruptcy. Charges so seriously made by serious-minded men, apprehensions so grave and deep-seated among honest citizens, demand a thoughtful and well-chosen answer, not flippant and shallow jeers and tricks of oratory that will not bear analysis. Mr. Bryan overflows with the wit of the cartoon papers, and punctuates his speeches with imaginary anecdotes or cullings from "Life," "Puck" or "Judge" as lightly and as frothily as the buffoon who amuses yokels on the country stump during local campaigns. The man who takes life seriously, who would have this Government adopt a wise financial course, whatever it may be, single or double standard; the man who is face to face with the problem, is conscious of its importance and anxious to meet and determine the question fairly and squarely upon its merits, will find neither meat nor muscle, neither logic nor reason in the speeches Mr. Bryan has so far delivered here. He has not made a statement which has not already been met and vanquished upon a dozen platforms.

Mr. Bryan ridicules the idea that the quantity of silver bullion contained in a dollar would remain at fifty-three cents so long as the Government would coin it free of expense into dollar pieces, and he asks sarcastically: "Who would sell bullion at private sale for fifty cents, if he might himself have it coined at one hundred cents?" It is at this point that many a good man stumbles. The writer has read one hundred or more letters, written from all over the West to the author of "The Story of the Silverthorne Family," a pamphlet issued during the late campaign. In every letter from individuals leaning toward the silver side the same question was asked: "How is it that the dollar of free coinage will be a fifty-three cent dollar, when the Government stamps it one hundred cents? And if it will be a fifty-three cent dollar, and silver refuses to increase in value, how will the owner of bullion profit by the transaction?"

Measured in gold, and gold is the standard the world over, the silver dollar of free coinage will be worth fifty-three cents. Mr. Bryan admits that it would be worth less than at present. His contention is that the dollar of to-day has appreciated in value and has too much purchasing power. He would give us more pieces of silver money with less purchasing power. We would be more prosperous because we could jingle in our pockets two pieces of money with no greater purchasing power than one piece has at present. He wants the value of commodities to rise, not the value of money. This he proposes to accomplish by calling something a dollar that is not a dollar under our present measurement of value. Immediately this kind of money comes into circulation, every merchant will mark up his prices until they reach a figure calling for as many of the new dollars as it would take to equal in value the present price of the gold dollar. If your new dollar should be worth fifty cents in gold, then an article now selling for one dollar of the present money would sell for two dollars of the free coinage money. "So prices would go up," says Mr. Bryan. "So money would be debased," says the opposition. The silver miner would profit by this transaction, inasmuch as he would find a ready market for his bullion. He would be able to demand and obtain an American coin stamped one dollar for a given quantity of silver that can now be purchased for fifty-three cents. We would call that disc of metal a dollar, but its purchasing power would be limited and restricted and would vary and fluctuate with the price of bullion as measured in gold in the markets of the world. Mr. Bryan claims that by a mere Act of Congress we may place silver upon a parity with gold at the ratio of sixteen to one, and increase the value of the silver money of China, Mexico and the strait settlements over $932,000,000—an amount greater than many a national debt.

Mr. Bryan's tour of speech-making will have a good effect upon the people of America, for it will set them to thinking in time of peace, when party fervor is not running high, and if they will but investigate at such a season, when calm deliberation is possible, one cannot doubt the result of their investigations will firmly oppose the silver theories of Populism.

THE COLONIAL POLICY OF GERMANY.

At the opening of the session of the German Reichstag, which adjourned last week, the German Admiralty presented for the consideration of the legislative body an official programme, which called for an appropriation of about $32,000,000 for the increase of the German fleet. The proposals were accompanied by a strong hint to the legislators that a great war might soon be necessary for the safety of the Empire, and for its expansion into a power with world-wide interests and a world-wide policy. But the frightened legislators recoiled from such a prospect, and refused at first to give their sanction to the beginning of a programme, the end and object of which they feared, and feared the more because they were concealed. It was then announced that the Kaiser, without regard to the disapproval of the Reichstag, would proceed with the programme as laid down; that the ships of war asked for and refused would be built anyway, and that the money would have to be forthcoming when the time came to pay for them, if not from the present or future Reichstag, then by the methods with which Germans became familiar in the days of Bismarck and the first Wilhelm. It was a clear threat that the means by which the Iron Chancellor had made the Prussian army, in spite of the opposition of the Prussion Landtag, would be resorted to to provide a German navy with which to establish the dominion of Germany on the seas, and beyond the seas, as firmly as the German army has established the position of the Empire in Europe.

There is, to be sure, no second Bismarck yet in sight prepared to carry his sovereign through another such time of conflict, but it is not at all improbable that the bumptious young Kaiser considers himself abundantly qualified to fill the role of the Man of Blood and Iron which Bismarck played for the first Kaiser. To this distinct threat the Reichstag yielded, the greater part of what the Kaiser and his counselors demanded has been given to them, and there is no reason to doubt that the full measure demanded as the means of carrying out the imperial policy, whatever it may turn out to be, will ultimately be granted or, if not granted, will be extorted. The interesting question now arises, What is the German imperial policy, and what part is the German navy designed to play in its development?

Naturally, Great Britain, as the foremost naval power of the world, looks with interest and with some suspicion on any increase of the naval strength of the Germans, and the British press has not been slow to comment on it, and to forecast the probable result if the Kaiser's ambition shall lead him into a conflict with the United Kingdom. The German navy as it exists to-day is by many reckoned as the fourth in strength in Europe, being surpassed only by those of Great Britain, France and Russia. Its quality is such that the British may well say of it what was said by a Marshal of France of the British infantry in the Peninsular war: "It is magnificent, and, thank God, there is very little of it." For very little of it there is when it comes to a comparison with the prodigious naval force of the British Empire, and even if the Kaiser encounters no obstacle to his design of increasing his fleet as rapidly as possible, it will be many years before he can find himself in condition to challenge the supremacy of England on the sea, or to undertake, with any reasonable prospect of success, to acquire by conquest any of the British colonial possessions. It is against some power lower down in the scale of naval strength that his plans are, doubtless, formed, and it is not at all improbable that he sees in the United States an obstacle to his scheme of imperial expansion, and that it is to silence or to overcome our opposition that he needs a greater navy than would be necessary for merely maintaining the present position of Germany in Europe.

Since the overthrow of the French Empire by the German armies in 1870, Germany has increased greatly in population and in wealth. She has developed immense manufacturing industries and built up a merchant marine which is second only to that of the United Kingdom. In her the British have learned to recognize their most dangerous rivals in the industry and trade of the world. For some years it has been evident that the expansive power of the German race has been beyond the capacity of the present territories of the Empire to accommodate, and that the overflow of German's population has been going to strengthen alien and possibly hostile countries. From this condition has grown up in Germany a colonial party whose purpose is to provide for the Empire a colonial dominion to which the surplus sons and daughters of the Fatherland may emigrate without being expatriated, and where they and their descendants may continue to be Germans. In pursuance of this policy Germany has acquired within a few years territory in Africa and in the Islands of the South Pacific amounting in the aggregate to a million square miles, but in all that vast area barely 2,000 Germans are now living, and these are traders, not settlers. The British and the French had been before them in the colonizing field, and there was left to Germany only regions in which there is no present prospect of a successful settlement by a white race. Even if by the absorption of Holland the Dutch colonies should fall into the hands of the Germans—an event to which all Germans look forward as something close to a certainty—the desired end would not be attained, for the Dutch possessions have never been settled by their white possessors. They are and always have been mere trading stations, and they furnish no soil to which branches of the German race could be transplanted with the hope that they would take root and flourish.

There remains one field in which the Kaiser may think that he sees a posisbility of establishing a new Germany beyond the sea. The great continent of South America lies largely in the temperate zone, and presents wide areas suitable for occupation and development by a people so intelligent and so industrious as the Germans. Already there are thriving settlements of former subjects of the Kaiser in the Argentine and in the Brazilian States of Santa Catarnia and Rio Grande do Sul. But these settlements of Germans are not German colonies. They contribute nothing to the strength and prestige of the German Empire. It may be the Kaiser's ambition to restore his lost subjects to their former nationality, and to find in South America a reservoir to which may be directed the stream of German emigrants who are now entirely lost to Germany. Only one thing stands in his way, if such is his ambition, and that is the declaration of President Monroe which for three quarters of a century has made South America safe from the colonizing raids of European powers. The instability and weakness of the governments of most of the South American republics are such as to furnish easy pretexts for attack to such a sovereign as Wilhelm Second, a sovereign who is not much hampered by constitutional restraints and who considers himself vastly superior in wisdom to his subjects and their representatives. He must know, indeed, that any attempt on his part to conquer a foothold on the southern continent would be resented by the United States and resisted with the whole strength of the republic; but he may feel strong enough to risk the encounter. He knows our present military weakness, and there is probably not a detail of our foolish military administration which is not known to the German general staff. He may have concluded that he can safely ignore our army and that it is with our navy alone that he would have to hold any serious reckoning. From this point of view the demand for an increase of the German navy becomes intelligible.

We have assumed a position toward the weaker republics on our hemisphere which casts upon us the duty of standing between them and any armed aggressor from the other side of the world. The Germans do not love us. They have cherished a resentment against us ever since our government intervened between them and the Samoan morsel, which they were about to swallow a few years ago. So long as there is even a remote probability that, in the discharge of our self-assumed duties toward the southern republics, we may be called on to resist the German tendency to forcible expansion, we cannot afford to throw away such an ocean outpost as the Hawaiian Islands, and we cannot afford to arrest the development of our navy short of the point at which it will be competent to curb the efforts of the Kaiser, or of any other ambitious sovereign, to gratify his earth hunger at the expense of our neighbors.

TWO SPECIES OF MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

There has been perceptible recently a faint renewal of public interest in the discussion of the possibility of securing a new municipal charter for San Francisco. The Merchants' Association continues its work in that direction, and opens the columns of its journal to suggestions and discussions of what is desirable in such a charter. There have appeared of late some expressions of opinion favorable to the European plan of city government, and arguments have not been wanting to urge the adoption of that plan in the next charter to be submitted to the people.

Under this system the municipal electors choose a body which is called a town council. With the choice of that body the duty of the voter ends, except insofar as he may feel called upon to observe and criticise the official conduct of the councilors and to favor them with advice as to the discharge of their duties. The council chooses its own presiding officer, who thereby becomes Mayor or Lord Mayor or Burgomeister, as the case may be. The council appoints its own standing committees, just as the United States Senate does, and these committees discharge the duties of the various boards of commissioners, elective and appointive, to which American cities are wont to confide the direction of the different branches of the municipal service. Under each of these committees is a permanent salaried official, who is the executive head of the department over which the committee presides. The council contains in itself the entire body of municipal powers. It is a legislative, an administrative and a financial body. It enacts the ordinances of the city, levies and collects taxes, appropriates the municipal funds to the several municipal wants, and expends them as appropriated.

Nobody can fail to see the close resemblance of such a system of city government to the government of the United Kingdom by the House of Commons. In the affairs of Great Britain the House of Commons exercises the functions of legislation, taxation and appropriation, and the Cabinet, which is merely a committee of the House, is the real executive of the kingdom. It is easy to understand why such a system of city government has grown up and proved itself acceptable in England, and in other countries in which the citizens have always been accustomed to see the legislative and executive powers exercised by one hand or by one body. And not a little of the success of the system is due to the fact that it prevails in old and stable communities in which the civic spirit has had ample time to grow, and where the citizen is as much interested in the policy of his town council as he is in the policy of his national government.

In the United States, on the other hand, we have from the beginning of our government as a nation insisted on the separation of the great functions of government and have entrusted them to separate and independent hands. We elect a Congress which may make laws but must not execute or interpret them. It levies taxes but does not collect them. It appropriates money but others expend it as appropriated. We elect a President who, to be sure, has some small share, of a negative character, in the making of laws, but whose sole remaining duty is to execute them when made by the Congress. And, finally, we have a corps of judges whose duty it is to interpret and apply the law as it is given to them by the people and the Legislature, but who have no voice in the making of the laws which they are to interpret. On this same plan have been formed all of our State governments, and it is not unreasonable to conclude that our people will do well to adhere to it in their attempts to work out a practicable system of municipal self-government. They have become accustomed to look to one branch of government to detect the corruption and check the encroachments of any other branch, and to feel themselves relieved, to that extent, of the duty of personal watchfulness over the details of the official conduct of their chosen Governors. We believe that this tendency is now ineradicable, and that the only prospect for good city government under a legislative grant of municipal powers lies in the complete severance of the legislative and the executive functions of the city government. With the judicial power in such a government we have, fortunately, no concern.

The people of San Francisco have had ample experience, under successive Boards of Supervisors, of government by council and committees which engross the whole municipal power, legislative and executive. If the Supervisors were restricted to legislative functions alone—including the power of levying taxes without the power of expending them directly—the pressure of unworthy men for seats in that body would be greatly dimnished. With the whole executive power in the hands of a Mayor, who should have power to appoint and remove, all executive subordinates, the pressure of the people to choose a good Mayor would be irresistible. Let the next new charter provide such a system and we firmly believe that it will be accepted by the people, and that San Francisco will have a good government.

ON THE EVE OF ANNEXATION

Commercial and Strategic Value of Hawaii to the United Stotes.

If one looks at the movements of the great peoples of the world with the largeness that the sight demands, with an intellectual eye, let us say, of the dimensions of the Yerkes glass, one is inevitably led to a certain definite conclusion. The great nations are growing larger. There are two ways in which a nation may grow. One way is by expansion, the other by absorption. The first is the Latin system, the way in which Rome developed, an impulse coming from the Anglo-Saxon method; it is the way in which England and Germany have extended their boundaries, the attraction to a common center. In the first the movement is in a direction away from the center; in the second the movement is toward the center. The movements are directly opposed to one another, but the result is identical. It is aggrandizement.

The nations are becoming larger; one by one the great powers are absorbing the smaller; one by one the little kingdoms and domains and principalities are falling into the government of one or the other of the world's nations. Just as Germany was compelled to a unification with Prussia, just as England, the greatest and most gluttonous gobbler of them all, swallowed India, and just as now the United States of America is about to annex the Hawaiian Islands.

Consider for a moment the disposition of the Pacific ports. South of the Equator are any quantity of harbors, ports and stations that have been pre-empted by or brought under the protectorate of some one of the great nations. But north of the Equator there are only two groups of Pacific islands that can boast of any harbors to speak of. To the north are the Aleutian Islands, already the property of the United States, but almost too far out of the way to be of any international importance. But if this government should annex the Hawaiian Islands it would by such means have advantage of an enormous area of unoccupied ocean. By their very position the Islands should belong to this country, and to no other, since they are its natural outposts, in a commercial as well as a military and strategic sense of the word. Practically the Islands are already ours. The government has gone so far now that should any interference on the part of an outside nation subvene during the coming recess of Congress the President could rightfully interfere on behalf of the country at large.

Again, the annexation of Hawaii is directly consistent with the revival of the old-time maritime spirit which has become apparent in the American people since the building of the new navy. The coastwise commerce of this country is quite the largest in the world, but even that is exceeded by the scope and magnitude of the Great Lakes commerce. In the States around the Lakes a genuine sailor spirit has been aroused analogous to that of the old old-time Mediterranean republics, all this within the last fifteen years. Living between the two greatest oceans of the world, and having in its center the greatest system of lakes in the world, it would be surprising if the United States were not a strong maritime power, and such being the case, surely Hawaii—as the key to the Pacific—should be ours.

Look for a moment at any of the travel maps of the world and see how many lines converge and meet at Hawaii. It is the cross-roads of the Pacific, from America to Middle Asia, from San Francisco to Australasia, from the mouth of the Nicaragua Canal, from Callao and Valparaiso and the Straits of Magellan to Port Arthus, Japan and Russia. It is only a question of time, and a short time at that, when the Pacific will be the great trading ocean of the world. The completion of the trans-Siberian railway and the opening of the canal through the Isthmus are to revolutionize the whole state of the Pacific commerce and will make the Hawaiian Islands of almost inestimable importance. The sudden leap of Japan into the ranks of the civilized nations has gone far to hasten this time, and Corea and China, under the influence of the Mikado, are soon to become factors that must be reckoned with by the commercial world. England has already made herself felt in the Pacific by way of India, and France, too, is striking in from Siam.

From a military, strategic point of view the possession of the Islands is even more important. In case of war with England (supposing that England should get control of Hawaii), the Islands could and of course would be used as a base of operations against the Pacific Coast. So long as the United States is not in possession of the Islands they remain an impending menace to the safety of the Pacific Coast, in the not impossible event of a European war, as a naval station. They are invaluable, for not only could the harbor be made practicable by the largest battleships now extant, but at a very small expenditure could be put into an admirable state of defense. An English squadron could mobilize upon Honolulu, and from that point, as it were, the British islands themselves could send out commerce destroyers in every direction and literally sweep the sea of American ships, and this with perfect impunity. Captain Mahan, the great American naval authority, speaking of the possible seizure of the Islands by the British, has said:

"It is rarely so important a factor in the attack or defense of a coast line—of a sea frontier—is concentrated in a single position, and the circumstance renders it doubly imperative upon us to secure it, if we righteously can."

The other nations of the Old World have long since seen the strategic importance of the Hawaiian Islands, and have more than once attempted to seize them. Twice have foreign flags been raised over them, and one nation at least—our old, inveterate, hereditary foe, our only one—has made strenuous though futile attempts to gain possession of them. No clear-minded American can doubt for a moment that had it not been for the firm attitude of our government in the matter England would have long since landed troops at Honolulu "to preserve order," and would have been busily engaged in "preserving" it at this present moment—the kind of preservation, for instance, that builds fortresses, establishes barracks, organizes armies of occupation and strews the harbor entrances with torpedoes and mines. If, then, Hawaii would be such an important acquisition for England, why should it not be equally so for us?

There are few harder lots in life than that of royalty unendowed with wealth. The pauper princess, the Infanta Isabella, who died last month in Paris, was a striking case in point. She was a sister of the present King-Grandfather of Spain, a niece of Ferdinand VII, and a granddaughter on the maternal side of Francis II, King of Naples. The late Infanta made a runaway match in 1841 with the Polish Count Gurowsky, who died ten years ago, and in her time had been greatly considered in the highest circles of society in the French capital. Latterly she had been dependent on a small pension bestowed regularly by the King-Grandfather aforesaid, and lived in a pair of rooms over a courtyard near the Parc Monceau, served only by a femme de menage, who came in for two hours a day. Her only other visitor was a former lady of honor. The princess would walk out early in the morning, with a hood or broad-brimmed hat drawn well forward to conceal her face, doing her own marketing and carrying home her provisions in a small basket, with fancy knitting on the top to hide them. Her children made rich alliances, but troubled themselves little about her. Whenever they did spare her any of their funds she would bestow gifts on her numerous godchildren among the poor. She was always ready to stand godmother to any little one, and never lost an opportunity to attend a poor funeral. An apoplectic attack finally ended her existence. When the seizure took place she was entirely alone, and was found, some time after death had taken place, by her femme de menage.

His Wife's Son.

FROM THE FRENCH OF MARCEL L'HEUREUX

It was at Cannes that Pierre Geliot first met the adorably little Marquise de Ronieres, whose divorce had made so much stir some two years before. The husband had not only won the suit, but was also allowed the custody of the child. However, the Marquise had innumerable champions, who did not hesitate to declare that she had been the victim of an odious conspiracy. After the trial she retired from the world, living alone, and visible only to her most intimate friends. It was one of these who brought Geliot to call. Marthe de Ronieres was at that time eight and twenty years of age, and possessed a delicate, melancholy beauty. Pierre at once fell in love with her—eperdument. His was one of those nervous, highly organized natures with whom love is a mild hysteria, and all his youth he had been subject to crises of passion. His affection for Marthe seemed to be his grand affaire, and, in fact, though his Catholic conscience gave him many a twinge on the subject, the two were at length married. It was a strange marriage — the union of two such temperaments was in itself an augur of evil to follow.

Nevertheless their married life seemed to give the lie to the gloomy predictions of their mutual friends, and for two years Marthe and Pierre were genuinely happy. A child was born — a delicious pink little gamin, who came suddenly into their lives like some new kind of sunlight. But, unfortunately, though they had left the Past behind them, it was there, nevertheless, waiting and watching its opportunity to destroy this frail card house of their happiness.

Last summer at the seaside, the hazard of the dining-room, with brutal unconcern of consequences, brought face to face Pierre and Marthe and the Marquis of Ronieres and his little son. Then, in that banale eating-room, in the midst of a clatter of conversation and the hurrying of waiters, occurred one of those secret dramas of life, all the more poignant because the actors must perforce repress their feelings, suffering in solitude with the hidden shame of their grief and with humiliating knowledge that the heart of each is known to the others as an open book.

At the sight of her first husband Madame Geliot was shocked almost to the point of fainting. Throughout a period of ten years she had not heard either of him or of his son—her son—and now, suddenly from out the calmness and placidity of her life, occurred this sudden resurrection. And also must she hold herself against the maternal instinct that drew her sharply to her little son—her other dearer little first son, who had long since forgotten her.

The two husbands furtively observed each other, hating one another at first sight, moved by an unreasoned instinct. Ronieres affected a lofty indifference, and a stolidity he was far from feeling, while Geliot betrayed his agitation by a sudden restlessness — a movement of the finer muscles of the face and a quantity of nervous and erratic gestures which he found as impossible to control as the twitchings of Saint Vitus. And the drama of this lamentable scene was made still more poignant by the presence of the two little children unconsciously exchanging smiles and coquettries with one another across the table.

That same evening M. and Madame Geliot went back to Paris. Not a word was even spoken between them of the dreadful scene in the hotel dining-room, but merely by the glances exchanged between them they knew that their happiness was at an end — that hereafter the Past would stand between them, killing their mutual confidence and poisoning their lives.

By far the bitterest jealousy is that which is jealous of the past—that has nothing tangible to work upon—that fights the air in the dark!

How often, in the first months of their marriage, had Pierre Geliot felt its spur! But in the end time had done its work. He did not know the Marquis de Ronieres, had never seen the son of his wife. By means of her tact and the delicacy of her affection for Pierre, Marthe had put from them both that menacing period of her life. Then their child had been born and the last tie between the present and the past seemed to have been broken. Life spread out before them fresh and new and smiling. And now the merest chance — stupid and evil chance—had all at once quickened this past they believed forever dead.

From this time on a sombre process began to take place in the mind of Pierre Geliot. His memory, abnormally active, and his imagination, abnormally vivid, had carried away from the hotel dining-room not only the general impression of the scene, but also its most trivial details. At will Geliot fancied he could recall it all with the distinctness of a photograph, especially the pale and impassive face of the Marquis, with his blonde beard and his eyes of a hard, cold blue, and he could picture to himself his wife's son, blonde and pale like his father. The resemblance was striking. At once he found himself comparing the physiognomy of Ronieres with that of his own son, who also was blonde, who also was pale, who also had cold blue eyes. His own son strongly resembled that of the Marquis, and abruptly the logical conclusion to be drawn from the resemblance, gripped upon him, brutally, fiercely, resistlessly.

Pierre would have fled from the horrible idea, but in vain. He studied his son closely. The likeness was certain — undeniable — and the miserable man told himself that, no doubt, Ronieres had also perceived the likeness, and that, no doubt, his amour propre had thrilled with joy and satisfaction at the thought.

Given the naturally nervous temperament of Pierre Geliot, it is easy to understand and imagine the disorders that were the outcome of his fancied discovery. The idea of this fatal resemblance tortured him in his love, in his pride, and in every quality of his nature. It became firmly established in his brain, undermined his reason, overturned his intelligence. The progress of the moral disease was not slow. Every day Pierre loosened his grip upon his wits. Even by his attitudes and gestures one could see that he was rapidly approaching a nervous crisis. He began to loathe his wife and child. More than once Marthe surprised him watching them with the expression of the deepest hatred in his eyes.

One day she tried to question him on his trouble. What was it that was so weighing upon his mind? What evil was this he was hiding from her? He looked at her an instant in silence, then, suddenly seized by an ungovernable fury, struck her and thrust roughly from him her little child, who had been clinging about her skirts. His little son fell, cutting his forehead on a projecting angle of the furniture. There was a spurt of blood, and Pierre, raising his voice in a lamentable cry, fled away, down the staircases of the house.

To-day, in the sanitarium where he is confined, the unhappy madman, by a singular shifting of indentity, believes himself to be the Marquis of Ronieres and implores his guardians to help him meet out vengeance upon this wretch Geliot, who has slain his son.

AN IGNORANT CROESUS

Barney Barnato's Queer Ways and Large Means.

Mysterious enough during his life time, now that Barney Barnato is dead and done for stories of him are springing up like a rank growth of weeds, and we have begun to know something about the man. In the first place his name appears to be not "Barney," but Barnett Isaac Barnato, and his parents poor folk, Hebrews, in the Whitechapel district of London, where also Barney lived till he went to find a fortune with half a dozen others, in South Africa in 1873. Almost his first impression of Cape Town was the sight of a large elderly gentleman, very portly, who wore three huge diamonds in his shirt front, and who was spoken of as the President of the Diamond Diggings. He spoke kindly and patronizingly to the raw little Jew boy from Whitechapel, and asked him what he did. "I am called Barney Barnato," said the other, "and I am going up to the diamond fields, where I hope to make a good deal of money." What follows is told in Barney's own language, for, Heaven save us, he has written and published his autobiography.

"A look of sympathy, almost of pity, suffused his face, as, placing his hand in a fatherly manner on my shoulder, he said:

" 'Go home again, my boy, for I have cleared that country of all the gems it contained,' and, looking at the sparkling brilliants which shone out from every possible part of him, I was almost convinced that his statement was true. I was too proud to let the tears of disappointment fall, and stood wondering what would be said to me if I returned home to admit that I had been on a wild goose chase; this was sufficient to make me adhere to my original intention, whatever the result might be, so I determined to go and book my seat on the coach which was leaving the next morning, lest anything else should occur to make me waver.

"This year—twenty-three years after my interview with him—I met in the market square at Johannesburg this same gentleman, who had cleared the country of all the gems it contained, and on my reminding him of the incident he asked:

" 'How did you discover the De Beers diamond mines and become a life Governor of the company?'

"I replied, 'By not taking your advice to go home again.' "

It was in some of his dealings with Rhodes, however—that colossus of Rhodes—that Barney's shrewdness came to naught. He was up against a bigger man than himself, and a cleverer, and the anecdote is happily illustrative of the fact that even the extraordinarily quick witted man is no match for one really great, even in trivial things (if indeed a bucketful of diamonds could be so classed.) Several years ago Barney's firm was a very large customer of the Beers for rough diamonds. Barney made Rhodes an offer for an unusually l quantity of stones en blue. After a moment's thou Rhodes answered:

"All right, Barney, you can have the diamonds on your own terms on one condition."

"And that is?" asked Barney.

"I'd like to see what no one has ever seen yet," said Rhodes, "a whole bucketful of diamonds; let's pour 'em all out into a bucket." It was done as Rhodes suggested, and afterwards the diamonds were photographed. The deal was consummated, and Barney, struck with the strangeness of Rhodes' conditions, asked why he had made them.

"Well, you see," answered Rhodes, "these diamonds have to be resorted into 160 different classifications, and it's going to take a long six weeks, at least. Meantime I've got an absolute command of the diamond market."

It was always well known that Barney, while he had a great admiration for Rhodes financially, opposed his political schemes, and always set his face resolutely against the land-grabbing and aggrandizement to which Rhodes was so partial. As long ago as 1887, on the occasion of the sale of the Kimberley mine, this opposition of Barney's was always a feature in Rhodes' movements. When the transfer was made Alfred Beit, Rhodes and Barnato came together at the Grand Hotel, Kimberley. Each had a concession he wished to ask of the others. Those of Barney and Alfred Beit have long since been forgotten. That of Rhodes was one of the causes of the Uitlander insurrection.

"I want the power," said he, "to carry out the expansion here and in the Transvaal, and I want the company to back me up."

"Never! Never!" cried Barney, with great energy, and until 3 o'clock that morning the discussion was carried on angrily chiefly between Rhodes and Barney. Beit had but little to say, and said it in favor of Rhodes. At last Barney exclaimed impatiently:

"Well, Cecil, some people fancy this and some fancy that, and if you must be amused at empire-building. I suppose I'll have to humor you." The check was signed that night, and for years after its fac simile was sold as a souvenir in the Kimberley shops. It was for $5,500,000.

While he was a tenant of Spencer House, Barney's wife gave birth to a son, whom Barney promptly named after the Derby winner of that year. In honor of the occasion Barney proposed giving his wife a triple necklace of diamonds. When the jeweler called with the necklace, Barney opened the door himself, with the remark that although he had seventeen servants he could not that day get one of them to answer the door bell. Chevalier, the famous coster-monger singer, was present at the moment, and Barney showed him the necklace.

"Say," said Barney, "what do you think of these? Do you think they'll do? I wonder if we shouldn't get Mrs. Barnato something nicer."

"Yes, you might," answered Chevalier, throwing the necklace across the table; "But, I say, Barney, wouldn't this do for the baby to play with?"

A grand spectacle of chess with living pieces was recently enacted in the city of Prague in the presence of 5,000 spectators. The extent of the "chessboard" was 2,500 square metres (about three-fifths of an acre), and the "pieces" numbered 300, with 20 horses. The subject was the victory of the Bohemian King George Podebrad over the Hungarian King Mathias Corvinus in 1469. A similar performance was given in Prague on the occasion of the Ethnological Exhibition in 1895.

Highest single-night receipts at the Paris theaters bring together a curious list of plays. The Grand Opera's record breaker was "Tannhauser," 22,981 francs; at the Porte Saint Martin it was the mystery "La Passion," 13,012 francs; at the Opera Comique, the opera "Don Juan," 9,234 francs; at the Amedie Francaise Moliere's "Les Femmes Savantes," and "M. de Pourceaugnac," 8,825 francs.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The eminent Bryan has come and gone and has left us disillusionized. This is not the first city he has disappointed, nor will it be the last. The Popocratic candidate for President is neither the orator his followers depict him nor the magnetic statesman the "Exanimer" would have us believe. Force, he has, and confidence and a voice that carries over a vast area, but neither subtelty nor intelligence nor a sense of the character of his audience. We have orators of our own in San Francisco whose vocal and verbal attainments make a high standard by which to measure our visitors. As one critic observed, after listening wearily to Bryan's speech. "Heavens, but they are great speakers!" "Who?" inquired the friend to whom he had made the observation. "Why, General Barnes and John P. Irish, of course. This man is not worthy to unloose their shoestrings." That is really the current verdict on Bryan. Though the Pavilion at Woodward's Garden was jammed and crowded, the audience did not remain for the climax of the Popocrat's oratory. After the first few opening sentences the multitude began to stream through the doors just as it did out of the Madison Square Garden in New York when Bryan spoke there. There is nothing in the matter of the speech to arrest the mind, and there are so many extraordinary misstatements and exaggerations that the intellect is up in arms in protest. Yet it is easy to understand his success in certain environments. He has a rough but vivid enthusiasm which cannot but appeal to the masses. Indeed, it has been observed, with more truth than tenderness, possibly, that no man in the world is so admirably constituted as Bryan to talk to a hod-carrier.

The excursion of the great man through California has created a pleasing crop of dissensions among the Democratic leaders. There was tremendous competition for the honor of clinging to Bryan's toes, and those who for the honor of clinging to Bryan's toes, and those who captured a number were regarded with envious glances by their colleagues. This jealousy is liable to express itself sooner or later in the councils of the party and will not aid in the cause of harmony. Otherwise what need be thought of a man who makes his campaign three years before election? It is reasonable to believe that he who campaigns in an off year will never be called on for orating when the issue is nigh.

A rumor has been going the rounds of the town within the last week, that seems at last to have crystalized into a fact. It relates to the founding and organization of a new club. What the name of the association is to be has not yet been announced, and in all probability its members have not yet decided upon it. It will be inaugurated soon after the Spreckels building is finished. That the opening of the club should depend upon the completion of the structure is due to the fact that its members have been negotiating for quarters upon the very top floor of the huge white tower. It is also that the new club is an off-shoot from the Pacific Union, and is largely made up of the disappointed in the ranks of that institution, reinforced by a fair sprinkling from the Bohemian and University. The moving spirits of the scheme have certainly shown excellent judgment in the selection of an abiding place. It would be hard to imagine more delightful apartments. The new institution is to be a lunch club primarily, and while located in the very heart of the business quarter is at the same time far removed from the dust and noise of the city's streets. Besides, fancy the view to be had from the windows while at lunch! It is understood that a special elevator is to be run for the benefit of the lunch clubmen, a "through" elevator, that does not stop at way stations, not even upon signal.

Apropos of clubs, Uncle George Bromley, dear old Uncle George, the famous old Bohemian known and loved wherever the Bohemian Club is spoken of—and Heaven knows that is widely enough—has delivered himself of another "mot," which has already obtained a wide circulation in clubdom. It is Uncle George's custom to put in an appearance at the club about an hour after breakfast and take a little nap over his morning paper. Uncle George, as everybody knows, is very nearly 80 years old, though in Bohemia he is called the oldest young man that ever lived. One morning last week a certain member of the club discovered him in his accustomed place just waking from his wonted nap, and bade him a very good morning, at the same time asking him what was interesting in the morning's paper. "Nothing; nothing much," responded Uncle George. "But you know, my dear young sir, I never look at the headlines of one of our daily journals without a certain feeling of apprehension lest I should see in great scareheads, something like this: 'Gone to His Last Jinks. Another Old Bohemian Laid to Rest. Uncle George Bromley, of the Bohemian Club, Passes Quietly Away.'"

To William P. Sullivan belongs the honor of bringing off the successful and dignified Fourth of July celebration that San Francisco assisted at on Monday last. The affair differed from its predecessors not only in magnitude but also in arangement. But few civil organizations paraded, so the procession was comparatively brief, though brilliantly uniformed. Otherwise there were neither scandals nor quarrels, and we will miss for once that aftermath of bickering and accusations which seem the inevitable climax of a celebration in San Francisco. Of course, it is proper that the great holiday be fittingly solemnized, and after seeing the last procession one cannot but realize how much more appropriately this is done by soldiers in uniform than by citizens masquerading in military costume. The precision and dash of the men who walked the cobbles Monday last was a fine contrast to the clumsy and footweary air which our citizens are accustomed to wear when necessity or the order of some grand comander or another condemns them to march. Colonel Sulivan, who arranged the events of the day, is well known in military circles, and has a fine quality of executive ability which he has ample chance of exercising in his present role—that of Mayor's secretary.

Colonel Dan Burns has reason to believe the kind fate by whose ministrations he became wealthy has not abandoned the good cause of his fortune. The news he brings back from Candelaria indicates the discovery of three new ore bodies in the great mine and also a change in its character. The Candelaria has long been known as a silver mine, yet the latest developments have brought out rock which is sixty per cent gold. This means greater dividends to Colonel Burns and his associates, and, doubtless, better horses for Burns & Waterhouse. It seems that the Candelaria is a mountain four thousand feet high, and ...e tunnels and shafts have not yet defined the limits of the ore body. The latest manifestations and the extent of the good rock available make it one of the world's great mines well worth a trip to Mexico to see.

They have been examining certain ablebodied persons who have been admitted to the Force in Oakland on subjects connected with their future profession. Don't imagine civil service rules the municipality across the bay, because it does not, though it obtains in office the services of better men than this city can with all its resources. This, then, was not a civil service exam., but merely a brief drill as to matters which every man, and particularly every policeman, is supposed to know. The answers elicited were, in several instances, delicious. One sturdy fellow, asked to define homicide, replied: "That's suicide committed at home." Another deserving would-be guardian of the peace thought that committing a nuisance meant "getting together and having a good time." A third replied, when asked what manslaughter meant, "Oh, that's killing your brother in self-defense."

Probably the most popular and successful feature of the programme of the Christian Endeavor Convention was the grand concert and chorus that opened the exercises. It was a new departure and sets the pace for future conventions. The customary simple anthems were replaced by music of the highest order rendered with the greatest precision by an immense chorus of two thousand voices. The success of this concert was due to Mr. A. M. Denham, who has had some thirty-six years' experience as a conductor. He is a student of the Normal Music School of New York, and a pupil of the famous Italian master and composer, Carl Bassini and Signor Hensler. He has conducted choruses in Indianapolis and Minnesota, and for the past seventeen years has been director of the large choruse choir of the First Congregational Church in Oakland. He has visited all the musical centers of Europe, and, taken all in all, is one of the ablest conductors in the United States.

BOSWELL JR.

Henry K. Sienkiewicz, the author of "Quo Vadis," is the most remarkable of Polish writers. He has a striking personality and a wonderful capacity for work, preferring it to social attention and public notoriety. His great novel, "Quo Vadis," the scene of which is set in Rome during Nero's time, was originally published in serial form in the leading daily paper of Poland. Since then it has been translated in several languages, including English, and has become one of the most widely read books of the day. The exact local color so noticeable in "Quo Vadis," is the result of the author's close study of the localities mentioned in the novel. Mr. Sienkiewicz is as familiar with Rome as was Nero, and knows every natural phase of the scenes among which his characters move. He has already given much attention to the American girl, having made her the heroine of a number of short stories.

In his home life the novelist is particularly happy. He has several sons, whose education he is personally supervising, taking much pleasure and pride in their achievements, much more than in his own successes. He passes the summer with his family in the Karpathians, and generally winters in Rome, where one of the leading Cardinals is his intimate friend. He is also intimate with the several Polish artists in the eternal city.

Colonel Smolenski, the Greek commander, is endowed with great physical courage, as well as military wisdom. It is related of him that a few years ago he had to visit Germany for the purpose of undergoing a severe surgical operation. The doctors were proceeding to administer an anaesthetic, but Smolenski would have none of it. "Chloroform," he exclaimed, "is only fit for women," and while the knife was being used he said: "Go on gentlemen!" as coolly as though he were a mere spectator.

Sir Samuel Bancroft, the celebrated English actor, realizes a life-long ambition in receiving the jubilee honor of knighthood. Sir Samuel's stage work is more of the past than of to-day, and it said that several of the younger men, now in the vigor of their power, consider themselves overlooked, noticeably Mr. George Alexander and Mr. Beerbohm Tree, and it is even whispered that Mr. Wilson Barett thinks he has claims to consideration as an actor.

THE INVASION OF ENDEAVOR

Disposition of the Army A Somewhat Nearer View of the Soldiers.

San Francisco is in the throes of a Christian Endeavor Convention. The city of the Golden gate is appareled in purple and gold, the streets flutter with purple and gold streamers, purple and gold hangings frame the porticos of churches, banks and clothing stores. An arch—the familiar old arch of many a previous convention—spans Market street, and the result is an air of festivity that harmonizes splendidly with the blue skies and the golden sunlight of a California July. It is not for nothing that San Francisco has gone in so lavishly for gala attire. The crowd of strangers it is entertaining is the largest that has ever slept within its gates. It is also the most religious. For the first time in its history it has a great moral show on, and San Francisco—which the experts call the wickedest city in the world (except Port Said, perhaps)—has risen gloriously to the occasion. Yes, it has done greater honor to the visitors than Christian Endeavorers have ever before had paid them at convention times. Despite its reputation the guests must take home wtih them a brilliant impression of the city of the Golden Gate. The fine air of respectability it wears must awaken in their minds a reasonable doubt—an idea that, after all, "Frisco" may not be as black as its journals paint it. Indeed, the whole affair looks very well for the wickedest town on earth. Virtue, like beauty, is often in the eye of the beholder, and the delegates are all declaring their satisfaction over the arrangements, for their comfort and housing, for the good time given them, for the big concert and the good fellowship and all the other things so hospitably arranged for their benefit.

The Christian Endeavorers have invaded the city 30,000 strong like an army with banners flying; 30,000 pairs of shoes are wearing down the pavements; 30,000 voices are asking directions and all manner of unanswerable questions, and 30,000 purses are being emptied—slowly and carefully, of course—in stores, shops and hotels of Market and Kearny streets. Did you ever stop and think of how much money the Endeavorers will leave in San Francisco. At the very lowest estimate $1.50 is the amount per capita that will be spent daily, so that 30,000 people spending $1.50 per day for seven days is $315,,000. Now that's a good big round sum to be set a-rolling through the highways and byways of this burg, and it's the proverbial "conservative estimate"—half a million is probably nearer the figure. And besides this the influence of such a throng must be taken into the consideration. Of course a great many people poke fun at the Endeavorers, and perhaps there are fissures in their armor, but to say the very least, their interests are identical with those of law and order and progress and morality, and, on the whole, it's a mighty good thing for the city that they are here.

If you don't agree with this, why just supose that instead of Christian Endeavorers this host was composed of sports—you might talk about "influence" then.

It is really a sight to see the installments of the 30,000 coming into the city. Hardly an hour passes but that one of the seventy-two trains that are at work on the transportation problem does not halt panting on the Oakland mole and vomit forth its contingent and swell the throng of those already arrived. They travel for the most part in groups, these Endeavorers, a couple or more families going it together. The fathers in the lead with the heavier parcels and valises preoccupied and excited over the matter of cars and cabs and express wagons, the women folk behind them with the canes and umbrellas and children. You will see them passed on from one white-capped reception aid to another, finally to be lodged on the front of a Market street car, when they take a moment's breath and look about them.

There are not merely scores of these groups—these family parties—there are not merely hundreds; there are thousands and thousands of them, and as you stand at the foot of Market street and watch the crowd at the ferry exits growing bigger and bigger and yet bigger with every moment, broadening and widening like the overflow of a gigantic dam, you wonder how in heaven's name the city is going to take care of them. But the way these "good people" are being handled and managed by the local branch is really astonishing. That Reception Committee, for instance—the white caps. There are nine hundred of them altogether, two hundred in Sacramento to meet the trains from the East and North, two hundred at Fresno for the Southern trains, two hundred at Oakland, and the balance here in the city. These "white caps" were an excellent idea. You can pick them out in a crowd at once, and the people who wear them are a tremendous help to the visiting stranger. They tell where, when and how to register, where to go, what to do when he gets there, what hotels to stop at, when to get there and everything else that is worth knowing. Most of the delegations have ordered their matters very carefuly. The Pennsylvania delegation, for instance, came as a body (1,000 strong) and had their advance agents out here nearly two months ago making preparations, engaging three hotels entire and establishing a headquarters—at the Palace it is. Many other delegations have done the same thing. Each State has its headquarters, besides the general convention headquarters at the Pavilion.

The whole affair is really extraordinarily well managed. Whoever has been the moving spirit in the matter could be General of an army—or even a circus manager. At the Pavilion now there is every kind of branch office that is necessary. There are branch newspaper offices, branch postoffices, branch laundries, branch telegraph offices and telephone offices. The whole business and machinery of the convention can be carried on right there as if in the conning tower of a mammoth war vessel.

There is only one feature of the crowd that is at all open to unfavorable comment. One sometimes wishes that so many of the C. E. girls wouldn't wear glasses, and one would like to see a few waists among them. One could also desire that there were more young men in the number who did not dress in black diagonal cutaway coats, pique four-in-hands and striped "blue" trousers. The girls, though, impress one as quite different from the California type. We are used to the big, good-natured girl. Just a trifle indolent and particularly well dressed, almost Parisian in the smartness of her trappings. The type of girl that appears with the Endeavorers is different. She does not consider dress as of paramount importance; she is energetic and active, and she is smally built and practical, and not to be imposed upon one single bit. If she could only discard her spectacles she might be pretty, and one could forget she had too much waist.

The author of "The Descendant" is a remarkable young woman with a most unusual intellectual capacity. Her name is Ellen Glascow, she is only twenty-two years old, has keen brown eyes, chestnut hair, diminutive hands and feet and lives in an old gray colonial house in Richmond, Virginia. Miss Glascow is to a great extent self-educated. She did not go to school as a child owing to physical frailty, and save a little help from older sisters pursued her educational way unaided. At the age of ten she had read all of Scott's works, Hugo's "Les Miserables" and any book with a story to it she could lay hands on, and as her family was a bookish one she was well able to gratify her desires. At the age of sixteen her mind found its natural bent, and her studies from that time on were wholly scientific and political, so much so that she has rigidly followed in the way of Spencer's Synthetic Philosophy and has studied the works of Darwin, Mill, Huxley, Hackel, Lubbock, Lyell, Romanes, Moleschott, Weissmann, Laing and Grant Allen—a startling array for a young woman of twenty-two. Miss Glascow's studies are history and natural law, and man's real life, development or failure is what she cares to read about. Although Miss Glascow had written ever since she was able to hold a pen, she had published nothing save a short story called "A Woman of To-morrow." "The Descendant" was written in secrecy, partially in her bedroom and in the family sitting-room, as she had nowhere else to work, and here she was tried with many interruptions; but her labor was rewarded, for the very first deliberate acknowledgment she received for her book's success was the assignment by her father of a small, quiet room in the second story for her literary work, and in its peaceful seclusion, surrounded by books on science and political economy and walls covered with photographs brought from Europe last summer, the young authoress may write in quiet.

The depth and value of Miss Glascow's novel may be gauged pretty well by the amount of discussion it has occasioned. The deep research the author has made in science and politics, in the great run of natural law, necessarily makes it of much import in questions of the moment. Miss Glascow is now at work upon another novel of broader scope than "The Descendant," in which the hero is a young scientist and the heroine a most bewitching personality.

A BICYCLE GYMKHANA

How Leander Proposed to Vary the Meets of the Whirligig Club.

Leander sat down suddenly on my bench in the Park, where I had been listening to the music, and pushed his hat back. There was an agitation in his manner that betrayed intense excitement.

"Say, Just', I've got an idea."

"It's astonishing."

"You bet it is—I mean the idea, you fool."

"Oh."

"Listen here. I know you think I'm crazy about—"

"The head?"

"No, no. About wheels, by—"

"Same thing."

"Oh, well, if you won't listen."

"Go on, go on."

"Well, you know, that wheel club of ours; we call it the Whirligig Club, and we've been taking fortnightly whirls for the last year or so, and we're all dead sick and tired of it. That's all we can think of doing. We ride in the hot sun all day and drink beer en route and get up the next morning feeling like 30 cents, and—well you know how it is."

"I don't either."

"You said you wouldn't interrupt; wait till I unfold this idea. Now you know there's a girl's club around the corner from our quarters. They call themselves the Ixions, or some other fool name, but we've nicknamed 'em the 'Mary-Go-Rounds;' capital josh name, isn't it, now, for a girls' bike club? 'Mary-Go-Rounds;' I invented the name. Well, there's a scheme on foot to get up some kind of a joint entertainment—sort of a moonlight ride—a fly-by-night. The same kind of old thing we're sick and tired of. Well, now, I'm going to propose to the 'Mary-Go-Rounds'—"

"Which one?"

"Oh, get out. I'm going to propose that we all have a—what do you call it?—a gin—a gin—"

"Fizz?"

"No, a gym—gym—something or other. Some kind of a do-funny with an Indian name; see it in Kipling's stories."

"Oh, a gymkhana."

"Right you are. Yesir, a bicycle gymkhana. We and the girls get together and, oh, do all sorts of things; we—"

"You needn't wait for a gymkhana for that, you know."

"Just', you're horribly indelicate. I mean, mean—now, listen: we get a big building. The Mechanics' Pavilion would do, and have all sorts of events on bikes, potato races, hurdle races, lancers, obstacle races, slow races, and then, oh, yes, we'd wear—well, to begin with: First would come a sort of a march around. We'd all wear white duck trousers, and—"

"Leander! ! Talk about 'horrible inuelicacy!' Really I can't listen to this."

"No, no. We wouldn't wear 'em; we—"

"Good bye; sir, unhand me—"

"Oh shucks! I mean, of course, the Whirligigs would wear white duck trousers and caps, and red stockings, and the Mary-Go-Rounds would wear white duck skirts, and—and—and red stockings."

"Silk?"

"How do I know? Say, it would look out of sight; that march around would be a kind of musical ride; we'd go around the hall once, then down the center in twos, then down again in fours, then eight in a row, and then sixteen straight across. There'll be just sixteen of us, you know; eight men and eight girls. Then the girls would start from one corner and the men from the corner opposite and cross each other in the middle of the hall, forming a letter X—(frantic applause from the gallery.) The next event would be a potato race for three Whirligigs and three Mary-Go-Rounds. You see a girl can mount so much quicker than a man that the Mary-Go-Rounds would stand a good show of winning. Then we'd have a little funny business; a fellow would come out and do a clown act perhaps."

"Oh, I see. Leander, it's a shame, you're getting up this affair just to have a chance to show yourself off in some specialty."

"Oh, dry up. Say, and then we could introduce the winding of a Maypole by twelve little girls in white dresses, their wheels all bedecked with white roses—"

"Their wheels—what, with white roses?"

"Well, fixed up, you know. Then we could have an obstacle race; we'd put a couple of hurdles across the hall and the competitors would ride down the hall, dismount, lift their wheels over the hurdle, mount again, ditto with the next hurdle, eat a cracker at the far end of the hall, drink a glass of beer—"

"Beer for the Mary-Go-Rounds?"

"Well, lemonade, if you insist, and return as they came and make a circuit of the hall. Next would come a lancers, and after that a thread and needle race. The Mary-Go-Rounds would ride down the hall, present each of the Whirligigs with a thread and needle, and wait while he threads it; when he's done that she rides back again, and the first one in wins."

"Of course."

"Well, not always, 'cause I'm going to have a race where the last one in wins."

"Again for your 'special benefit.' "

"Say, I won't stand your guying me all the time; even the worm will turn, you know. No, this race is for the one who can go the slowest on a wheel without falling off. And, then—oh, but say, this would be the event of the evening. We'd have ring riding. The contestants one by one would ride down the hall at full speed, with a long spear in their hands and try to catch a ring on the point of the spear as they go by—and then—then—then—well," exclaimed Leander, drawing a long breath, "that's as far as I've got yet. Say, what do you think of the idea?"

"Leander," said I, "you've got a head between your shoulders, beyond any doubt, and if there are wheels in it they constantly do turn to some purpose. The bicycle gym khana is a novel and fetching idea, and some of the clubs here certainly ought to try it on.

JUBILEE JARS

The Sorrows of Citizens Whom Salisbury Refused to Make Noblemen.

Now that the Jubilee is a thing of the past, men are sitting down—specially in the London clubs—counting the cost and criticising the deportment of those in high place, and the one thing that rankles most, that sticks in the obstinate British crop is the briefness of Salisbury's honor list, i. e., the names of those preferred for knighthood and the like. Now on New Year's day or the birthday there is quite a little column of these, and all sorts of well-deserving men go about the world thereafter with handles on their front names and are very proud. But on this Jubilee occasion, quite the greatest week in the history of England, when if there ever was a chance to do the magnificent, the Marquis of Salisbury set forth the meanest, stingiest, most abbreviated honor list of the century. Men were promoted on strictly partisan lines by this noble Marquis, and grudgingly promoted even at that. Salisbury has made many a weak error and many a blunder in his administration, but never has he shown himself quite so little, quite so small and petty as in this promotion business. Think of passing over the Chairman of the County Council because he was a Radical! He—this Salisbury man—had a golden opportunity to make a splendid and dignified mark upon the passing pageant of the Jubilee and made a dirty little blot instead. The world has often had occasion to wonder whether Salisbury was a really great man or whether he actually fitted into Bismarck's contemptuous appellation of him. His niggling partisan jealousy in the knighthood promotions will go far to allay that doubt, and the day is perhaps not far distant when Salisbury will be known and acknowledged as a lath painted to imitate iron.

But the most amusing thing about this Jubilee business is the fact that the English have suddenly awakened to the fact that the Queen was pretty. Now, really, in all seriousness, it won't do; that sort of thing won't do; it's too downright bad, you know, to expect the world to swallow such a pill. The English may tell us (the poor miserable rest of us that have no part in the Jubilee and must be contented with our poor little Fourths and Fourteenths of July)—may tell the rest of us that dear old Mrs. Wettin is good and virtuous, but that she is pretty, that she has "lovely sapphire eyes," that her expression is "one of majesty, pride and tenderness," that she was the "belle of the occasion." Oh, come now—I say! Really, you know, it won't do.

By the way, the Orleanists were rather sharply turned down by dear, old Mrs. Wettin. She is related to all that family, and they were counting on special invitations and honors and all sorts of distinction which could be made into a beautiful advertising dodger for themselves and their royal claims. But England is rather friendly with the French Republic just now—apropos of contemplated arbitration treaties—and in the end they were all firmly shut out.

Another really important bit of news was the exclusion of Munir Pasha from the Jubilee procession. Munir Pasha is the Sultan's special envoy and a man of much mark and dignity. What was the surprise of London then to note that no place was allotted him in the line of march. Only the Sultan's aids were given a place. The thing in itself was important, but what made it of paramount interest was the fact that none of the London papers had anything to say about it the next morning. There is only one conclusion to be drawn from this surprising reticence. Beyond question the Foreign Office had requested that it be ignored, a request that gave the matter more notoriety than if it had been trumpted from the street corners.

But on the whole England is well satisfied with her Jubilee. She generally is with everything England does. What she is particularly proud of is that the affair was carried on by the people rather than by the Government. Private subscription paid for every yard of decoration, every point of illumination, paid even for the Poor dinner and for the transportation of the Colonial troops from their distant barracks to London.

In the course of her record reign Queen Victoria has seen six Archbishops of Canterbury, the same number at York, five Bishops of London, and every Episcopal See vacated at least twice, and many of them four or five times. Eleven Lord Chancellors have received the Great Seal at her hands. Ten Prime Ministers and six Speakers of the House of Commons have taken office during her reign, while she has survived every member of her first Privy Council, all those members of the House of Lords who sat there at her accession, and all the members of her first House of Commons, except Mr. Gladstone, Mr. C. P. Villiers, Mr. J. Temple Leader, and possibly one or two more.

THE TENNIS TOURNAMENT AT THE HOTEL RAFAEL

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

The glorious Fourth was celebrated at Del Monte very quietly and comfortably, but with the eclat which always characterizes festivities at the great caravansary. Never has the region looked lovelier than under the influence of the brilliant sunlight of the Nation's natal day. The gardens are glowing with flowers, and the air balmy with perfume and the scent of the pines and cypresses. An interesting set of people, composed quite largely of habitues of the Del Monte, passed the period from Saturday to Monday within the hospitable portals enjoying the music and the dance on Monday night, not to mention the elaborate menu set forth for the holiday dinner. Of course the conditions are changed at the hotel, whic is now being administered under the European plan, but thus far the innovation has proved a welcome relief, inasmuch as people order what they really require and no more, and the prices exacted are moderate. It is a fact that the average bills are below those of former years and the guests are satisfied.

Salmon fishing is the thing at Del Monte these days. The bay is full of fish and great catches are the rule. Both sexes indulge in the sport, which is much more exciting than tennis. There already begins to be heard talk of the annual "shoot" of the Country Club at Del Monte. It will be conducted under different auspices this year, and the indications suggest a satisfactory outing.

The Fourth of July hop at the Hotel Rafael established an unique precedent. It was a success—the first Fourth of July hop at the Rafael that ever was a success. Most hotel dances are distinguished for the degree of tedium they induce; in this both spectators and participants were interested. Of course there was the usual dado of onlookers round the ballroom, but for once the dancers were in a respectable majority. In addition to all this the affair was notable for the number of handsome women who figured at the festivity, and for the many smart gowns in which they were displayed. Indeed, save at the Cotillions, nothing more brilliant than certain of the "effects" is ever seen. Apart from the scenic value of the affair—and really that should not lightly be discounted—it had lots of swing to it and a certain real air of enjoyment, induced, doubtless, by the enthusiasm and excitement generated at the tennis match.

Among the most noticeable girls present were: Miss Gladie McFarland, the winer of the recent paper chase, who wore green and looked stunning; Miss Mary Belle Gwin, who has a reputation as a beauty; the Misses Oge, slender and graceful of form and charmingly pretty; Misses Minnie and Marguerite Jolliffe, Miss Julia Crocker and Miss Alice Adler. I remember also Miss Hunt and Miss Geisleman, who were beautifully gowned. Among the matrons Mrs. Churchill of Napa, Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels, Mrs. Crooks, Mrs. Paxton, Mrs. Tay, Mrs. Wilder of Honolulu, and Mrs. Fred Green were most conspicuous. Here, however, are some of the gowns they wore:

Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels looked her best in a white chiffon waist and a heavy white corded silk skirt trimmed with narrow white satin ribbons. Mrs. Fred Green was in an elegant ball gown of blue silk, elaborately trimmed with rich lace. Mrs. Blethen-Sherwood was handsomely gowned with yellow satin trimmed with white seed pearls. Mrs. William Fries wore a light blue chiffon waist trimmed with white lace and embroidered in gold, and a skirt of heavy white and blue brocaded silk. Mrs. Charles Fox Tay looked exceedingly pretty in a white chiffon waist with a white crepe skirt. Mrs. Churchill of Napa wore a white satin gown with a bertha of rare old lace. Mrs. Sam Heller was in an imported gown of white embroidered lace over silk, with exceedingly delicate trimming of small beads and spangles. Miss Emily Hager looked extremely stylish in white satin tulle, the trimming consisting of artificial violets. Miss Mary Belle Gwin wore white organdie over green silk, trimmed with Valenciennes lace and green ribbons. Miss Julia Crocker wore a charming gown of pink Pompadour silk, the waist trimmed with white chiffon. Miss Alice Hager was in blue silk covered with white organdie, the skirt having several rows of narrow ruching of the same material. The Misses Oge wore organdies; one was in light green and her sister in delicate blue. Miss Kipp wore yellow satin, the waist covered with white chiffon, and Miss Mary Kipp wore light blue. Miss Jolliffe looked very sweet in white embroidered chiffon over white silk. Mrs. Bush wore black chiffon, Mrs. Paxton wore a beautiful confection of white satin and a fichu of old lace, and Mrs. Frank Johnson was in a charming gown of black and white silk.

It was quite a glorious Fourth they had at San Mateo. The town has just been formally incorporated with A. B. Ford as airman of the Board of Trustees, and the celebration commemorated not only the national holiday, but also the inauguration of the new municipality. Irving M. Scott delivered the oration, which was a vigorous piece of speech-making with lots of good sense, patriotism and information in it, as Mr. Scott's speeches always have. The townspeople turned out in force in their best bibs and tuckers and were reinforced by delegations from the countryside. At noon Colonel Fred Crocker had Mr. Scott and a number of other gentlemen who had assisted in the celebration to lunch at his new home, and later in the day the assemblage repaired to the Hobart racetrack, where they indulged in games of various kinds and degrees. It seems there had been some difficulty about obtaining a suitable place for the sports. A delegation of citizens had called on Alvinza Hayward and Mr. Corbett for the use of their racecourses to celebrate the day, but neither of these gentlemen responded. Walter Hobart, who was appealed to finally, cheerfully acquiesced in the idea and gave carte blanche to the projectors. A spacious dancing floor and band stand were erected, together with awnings to shade the spectators. The affair was well conducted, and a series of races were put through effectively. There were half-mile dashes, sack and potato races, trotting races and many other things. Burlingame and all the country houses had delegations out to see the fun. Among the spectators were innumerable pretty girls in white and light dresses, and they danced rapturously throughout the afternoon. In the evening Mr. and Mrs. Hobart entertained a crowd of young people at dinner, and then drove them down to Menlo Park to attend the ball at the Ed Hopkins house.

It was a bit quiet at Burlingame over the Fourth, owing to the fact that so many people went to the festivities at Hobart's. It is interesting to learn that the Crocketts and Wilsons expect to move into their new homes next week, but the Kruttsnic villa will not be ready before August 1st.

It has really been much gayer at Menlo this season than at San Mateo. The Ed Hopkins have entertained a good deal, and their ball on Monday evening was quite the event of the summer season. Their house is admirably adapted for a big entertainment, inasmuch as all the rooms of the lower floor open into one another, so that there is lots of space for the dancers. A very fine supper was served, and later in the evening there were fireworks to give the proper national flavor to the occasion. The Eyres had a big luncheon party on the Fourth at San Mateo, and the Parrotts had their usual firework display.

Between the latest scandal and the Christian Endeavorers, the dailies missed recording the arrival of Mr. and Mrs. Lars Anderson last week. Mrs. Anderson was formally Miss Perkins of Boston, and quite the richest heiress in the United States, as she inherited twenty millions from her father and will have twenty millions more from her mothers, whose only daughter she is. Lars Anderson was Secretary of the American Legation at Rome at the time of their engagement, and is a member of a prominent Ohioan family. The bride is rather petite of figure, dark, and decidedly pretty. She is well educated and quite Bostonian in manner. She and her husband are traveling very comfortably, but without any affectation of style, and instead of making the world's tour in a private yacht, as they are abundantly able to do, they prefer touring around by the ordinary land and ocean conveyances. While in San Francisco they kept very much to themselves, but were entertained at a small dinner by Major and Mrs. Rathbone, who are old friends of both the Andersons and the Perkins.

Among the distinguished arrivals of the week was Mrs. Phoebe Hearst, who is accompanied here by her niece, Miss Apperson. After a few days at the Palace Mrs. Hearst went up to her beautiful Spanish villa at Livermore.

Decidedly the week has been gay at San Rafael. A variety of dinners, dances and picnics have been given. Bicycle parties have been an incident; luncheons at Fairfax were details. Miss Ella Goodall had a dance Saturday night at her temporary abiding place in Ross Valley—a smart affair, by the way, and followed the next day by a coaching party in which the same set participated, Mr. Will Powning's coach officiating. Then, the Babcocks had a dinner Friday night, Mrs. Warfield gave an elaborate dinner to Madame Barrios the same evening at the afael, Milton Latham escorted a party of young people to the beautiful grounds of the Miramonte Country Club Sunday. On the night of the Fourth there were several displays of fireworks around San Rafael, besides a very jolly vaudeville entertainment at the Page Camp. All this without a word for sundry minor dinner and supper parties at the Rafael and the great and only tennis tournament.

Though Madame Barrios has participated but slightly in the festivities at the Hotel Rafael, she has done a good deal of entertaining herself, and has reason to be thankful for the degree of health her stay there has gained for her. The dinner given in her honor by Mrs. Warfield was an elaborate affair—served in the private dining-room. A charmingly decorated table and some admirable wines were among the notable features of the entertainment. After dinner coffee was served in the tower-house, and then Mrs. Paxton sang a variety of songs very charmingly.

Out of Oakland there cometh precious little this week, except the gossip of far away festivities in which Oaklanders have taken part. This is but the happening of the expected, however. The citizens and citizenesses of the Alameda beau monde are scattered by mountain stream and sea and presumably are having a brilliant, hot time of it wherever they are. In a small way things have occurred, just, I suppose, to counteract the current impression that the county is deserted. For instance, there was a surprise party given to Mrs. Mary Partridge on Saturday evening, by the Oakleaf Chapter at the Scottish Rite Hall, in honor of her birthday. There must have been fifty of her friends present, and they were entertained with music and other forms of Christian Endeavor. Then Mrs. Howard Bray had a ragtag party, at which the guests appeared in most unique costumes. The host figured as the tamale man, "Prince Morocco." Miss Sinclair was disguised as a gypsy girl, lost, strayed or stolen. Fred Vane figured as "Ole Oleson, and Miss King was the "Daughter of the Regiment." It was really a distracting combination of tatters and colors, and out of it all came a great deal of fun. Besides the clothes, they had dancing and music, and an excellent supper.

Camping excursions exercise considerable of a fascination on certain residents of East Oakland. Quite a jolly party left for Pescadero on Thursday of last week, returning on Tuesday. It was composed of Mr. and Mrs. Frank C. Jordan and other members of the Jordan family, Miss Ida Lovett and Miss Grace Roberts, who borrowed for the occasion the large camping wagon of the Pringles, in which that adventurous family make their periodic trips into the country. This vehicle contains all the appliances for sleeping and eating, and its owners en route are magnificently independent of hotels and other resorts. The Jordans had a capital time of it and had an abundance of fun.

Among the many friends of Miss Grace Fisher, the clever Oakland girl who recently dared the dangers of the stage. There is due satisfaction over the hit she has made in New York. She figured as the younger sister in Madelaine Lucette Ryley's new play, "The Mysterious Mrs. Bogle." Another Oaklander, Mrs. Oliver Henshaw, formerly in the philosophic department of the State University, who has latterly passed a brilliant examination in Germany, is expected home on a visit to the Wilkinsons in Berkeley.

The daughters of the American Revolution have an organization in Oakland, and, as is proper in feminine societies, their meetings have several of the characteristics of a function. On Wednesday last at the home of Mrs. G. W. Percy there was a gathering of the charter members, when officers were appointed and various other arrangements made. Mrs. Percy is Regent, Mrs. Cornwall Vice-Regent, Mrs. W. H. Friend Registrar, Mrs. S. G. Smythe Recording Secretary, Miss Marguerite Knight Corresponding Secretary, and Mrs. Giles Gray Treasurer.

Fruitvale never looked more charming than at present, and there are those who declare its fascinations superior to all that San Rafael or San Mateo can offer. A very jolly little garden party was given there on Friday last at the home of Mrs. Charles Molder. It was in honor of Miss Peck of Milwaukee, who has been visiting Mrs. Alexander for the past few months.

There was a good deal of intellect in the party that set out last week for the McCloud River on a fishing excursion. It consisted of Senator Fred Stratton, Dr. McLean, President Martin Kellogg of the University, Professor Bradley and Lieutenant Greenleaf.

Quite a number of Oaklanders have located themselves for the summer at Sim Sothern's, which place seems to have developed quite a degree of popularity. Among others, the Goulds, Matthews, Nusbaumers, Glascocks and Edwards are there, and it is said the trout fishing is first rate. The climate and scenery are all that the most exacting could demand, which is saying a good deal.

THE TENNIS CONTEST

An Exciting Struggle for the Coast Championship.

During the latter part of last week throughout Sunday and, of course, on Monday, San Rafeal was given up to the tennis players. There were dozens of slender, cleancut youths around who dined sparingly and went to bed early, being in training for the tournament. The merits of the games played that resulted in the meeting of Whitney and Sam Hardy on Monday afternoon are a fitting subject for expert discourse, which the writer is not competent to give. But there is no denying the interest of the great match of the 4th—the game which took the championship from Hardy and vested it in Whitney. A select and fashionable audience witnessed the struggle and forgot to be self-conscious even, as it deepened in interest. It was quite the finest and most fiercely fought battle for the championship on record, and as a display of skill, determination and endurance was ahead of anything ever seen on the Rafael courts.

At first the tide of victory turned strong against Whitney, who, though rather the most brilliant player, lacked the coolness of his adversary, who won handily the first two sets. The future for the San Francisco man hung on the fate of the next set, which he won, not easily, indeed, but by sheer determination and dexterity. Every game was stubbornly contested—contested to the "vantage-deuce" stage, and Whitney escaped defeat time and again by the narrowest margin. Both men played a somewhat similar game, but negotiated successfully the most difficult strokes and evoked at frequent intervals generous bursts of applause for their brilliant "rallies." During the final set the greatest excitement prevailed, for the fate of the cup often hinged on the return of a single ball. In the narrow extremities Whitney was nearly always successful however, due to his excellent condition. Finally the San Francisco man won the decisive set, and then the decisive game, and straightway became the hero of the moment. Altogether the contest made a sensational and exciting spectacle—to what degree may be realized by the fact that the entire audience remained until the very end—somewhere in the neighborhood of 6 o'clock.

Hackett as a Substitute for Himself—A Good Show at the Columbia.

If the Lyceum Company is not crowding the Baldwin—and in truth it is not—the fault does not lie with the attraction, for it is of the first order; nor can the blame rest upon our theater-goers—for most of them are gathering freckels or sea shells, hillward or seaward, as their individual fancies have dictated. The bill for the week opened with an unnecessary one act comedietta, "When a Man's Married." Clever one act plays, like creditable short stories, are rare birds. One above the average happens along occasionally, but they are painfully infrequent. Ninety per cent. of them hinge upon marital quarrels, and call for nothing above the ability of an amateur.

But the "Mayflower" itself unfolds a sweet little love story of olden days. Historical accuracy the author entirely disclaims. He has simply taken in the dramatic possibilities of the situation. The self-expatriation of the rugged Pilgrim Fathers and the gentle maids and matrons of the day, the severing of ties of home and of love, have furnished the foundations upon which have been built an "idyllic love story" of almost exquisite workmanship.

Joan Mallory, who, with her father, had fled from England to Holland to escape religious persecution, meets Lord Gervaise Carew, whose father had been the author of all the misfortune of the Mallory family. Gervaise, a wild rake of fellow, falls desperately in love with the Puritan's daughter and she with him. A hurried determination to sail to America in the Mayflower, coupled with the superserviceable interference of a Jack Poynings, who also worships the dainty Joan, separates the lovers until Gervaise, after manifold hardships and privations, puts in an appearance at the settler's clearing near Plymouth.

This scant recital gives but the thread of a story that is purely, simply and effectively told in "The Mayflower." Joan gives Miss Mannering better opportunities than she has been vouchsafed before during the engagement. Daphne, in the "First Gentleman of Europe," bears a striking resemblance to Joan of "The Mayflower," but of the two the latter seems to more nearly fit the abilities of this young lady. It is a strange circumstance that in each of the three plays so far presented by this company the leading role falling to Hackett requires that gentleman to masquerade under an assumed name. In the "Prisoner of Zenda" he was Rassendyll, a young Englishman personating a Prince. In the "First Gentleman of Europe" he was the Prince of Wales disguised as Folliett, a young libertine and scapegrace, and in "The Mayflower" he is for a time Harry Butler, a college student traveling in Holland. Hackett appeared tired and worn Tuesday night and was not quite himself. Walcott, Dustan and Joseph Wheelock, Jr., were well cast and played most acceptably.

It is in such plays as "The Two Escutcheons" that the Frawley Company appears to best advantage, and to such plays it should confine itself altogether. The light lines of social talk and the light lines of social life become the ladies as well as their handsome gowns, and the gentlemen handle tea cups and repartee much better than swords or sombreros. And of tea cups and repartee is made "The Two Escutcheons" a bright, breezy nothing of bright, breezy people. Blanche Bates plays the Widow Stevenson, Maxine Elliott's role last season, and plays it better than did the lovely Maxine in spite of her training with Daly. Miss Bates has a better conception of the part and gives her lines more easily and with happier effect. Frank Worthing again plays opposite to the widow, a character well suited to his manners and action. His scenes with Miss Bates are the life of the piece, full of graceful comedy and clean by-play. Theodore Hamilton is the Baron and Phosa McAllister the Baroness, and two very aristocratic people they are. American sentiment is very likely with Mr. Foster, the pork gentleman from Chicago, but Mr. Foster of Chicago as played by Mr. Harry Corson Clarke deserves sympathy neither American nor otherwise. Such a relative would be a blot on any 'scutcheon, to say nothing of the Baron's. Mr. Clarke's comedy is clever, but not always desirably clever. Instead of holding the mirror up to nature he holds it up to burlesque and exaggeration. But Gladys Wallis as little Miss Foster makes amend for her uncultured papa, and is as pretty and dainty as only Gladys Wallis can be.

George Trader is back again at the Alcazar, and with him come a lot of memories of the old Alcazar days, when Ethel Brandon was the first lady of local stagedom and L. R. Stockwell our only comedian. Since then Mr. Trader has been with the Frohman's and Minnie Maddern Fiske, and has had a lot of excellent experience. He is playing this week in the familiar farce, "A Victim of Circumstances," and as the unhappy "victim" finds plenty of chances for clever light comedy. Miss Selene Johnson, the new leading lady, may be said to have made an agreeable impression. Miss Johnson lacks experience more than she lacks ability. She is tall and graceful, well formed and well gowned, and in view of all this and a little more that might be mentioned, some agreeable work may be expected from her. Mrs. F. M. Bates plays a mother-in-law, a mother-in-law of the stage, stagey, with the penal code and every other code continually at the end of her tongue, and plays the part with her usual energy.

FRANCIS CARLYLE

"Captain Paul" is a very patriotic play, and the audiences at Morosco's receive it in a very patriotic manner. Captain Paul is a young American soldier of fortune who wears a picturesque blue cloak and does everything from commanding a man-of-war to fighting a duel with two men at the same time. But Captain Paul is a brave, heroic young fellow, the very person who could manage a battle at sea and a double duel as well, and, played by Mortimer Snow, he is altogether a dashing and attractive figure. Two new people make their first appearance, Ulric B. Collins and W. F. Strong as Viscount Ormonde and Ben Ironsides. Both these gentlemen are highly melodramatic, more so and less convincing than any other two in the cast, Mr. Collins in particular; he should tone himself down to the more natural level of the company. Landers Stevens as Philip Breville makes the finest appearance in the entire play and acts well throughout. Maud Edna Hall looks very pretty in her long pink satin gown, but her blonde wig is not as becoming as her natural coiffure. Rosella La Faille is quietly effective, and the remainder of the cast is well up to the usual standard.

Oakland is coming into prominence with its local playwrights. Last week the three prize plays were put on and each one made a separate and positive success. Probably the most commented upon was Henry S. Kirk's "Love and the Roses," an unusually pretty comedietta. Although receiving the second prize Mr. Russ' "Nancy Fill" being given the first, and Miss Bunner's "Contest Play" the tird, "Love and the Roses" was the only one of the three on which the curtain was rung up, and in addition to this Mr. Kirk received a hearty curtain call.

DRAMATIC NOTES

Few plays of recent years have been as successful as the great Wallack drama "Rosedale." It has long been a favorite piece with celebrated actors, and in view of its intense interest and existing situations it has been equally popular with the public. The Alcazar revives "Rosedale" next weeek and will give it an elaborate presentation, with particular attention to the costumes, scenery and tableaux. Mr. Francis Carlyle makes his first appearance at this theater as Elliot Gray. Mr. Carlyle will be remembered for his good work in "The Girl I Left Behind Me" at the Baldwin some seasons ago. Hugo Toland will play Matthew Leigh, George Osbourne Miles McKenna, Adele Belgarde Lady Florence May, and Selene Johnson Rosa Leigh. The last performance of "The First Born" will take place to-morrow night.

For its last week the Lyceum Company will present a varied programme. First we are to have Sydney Grundy's comedy, "The Late Mr. Castello." The piece is in a farcical vien and the situations are both whimsical and ingenuous. It will be preceded by a one-act play, "The Wife of Willoughby." This is for Monday and Tuesday evenings. On Wednesday "The First Gentleman of Europe" will be repeated, and for Thursday and Saturday "The Prisoner of Zenda" is announced. A special bill is for the Saturday matinee. It is to consist of "The Late Mr. Castello," preceded by the balcony scene from "Romeo and Juliet," with James K. Hackett and Mary Mannering as the immortal lovers. The next attraction at the Baldwin will be Mr. John Drew in "Rosemary."

The Orpheum has a number of new people for next week. Frey and Fields, sketch artists; John Perry and Maurice Burns, Irish comedians, who are said to be quite clever; William Whyte, an Australian basso of some repute, and Lillian Perry, an engaging soubrette. Lew Dockstadter makes his last appearances, also Caron and Herbert.

Another military play goes on at Morosco's next week. It is a romantic Russian drama entitled "For Her Sake," and has had a sucess both in New York and in London. The action occurs in the reign of Alexander II., the story is intensely emotional, relieved with amusing comedy, and the scenery and costumes are very elaborate, noticeably in the first act, where a Russian encampment is shown.

The production of Mr. Charles Ulrich's Chinse play, "A Celestial Maiden," in Oakland next Monday evening is being looked to with much interest on both sides of the bay. Mr. Ulrich's piece differs from "The First Born" inasmuch as the Alcazar affair is merely a dramatic incident, while "A Celestial Maiden" is a complete drama entirely different in construction and replete with novel and startling phases of life in the Chinse quarter. Miss Ola Humphrey, who will play the Celestial maid Kim Soy, is a well-known Oakland girl who has a creditable professional record as a dramatic reader and as a member of Frederick Warde's company.

"The Isle of Champagne" has the boards of the Tivoli next week. There are three acts of fun and music which the experts declare better than "Wang." There is a King Mumm, whom Edwin Stevens will impersonate; Moet and Chandon are his soldiers, and Apollinaris Frappe his prime minister; between them they rule the Isle of Champagne. The complications will be unfolded at the Tivoli on Monday night. The cast includes Edwin Stevens, W. H. West, Miss Sea Brooke as Priscilla, Myra Morella will be the Diana. The opera is said to be well worth seeing, and therefore a treat is looked forward to.

GEORGE H. TRADER
The new member of the Alcazar Company

Next week at the Columbia Mrs. Rylev's comedy, "Christopher Jr.," will hold the stage, with Frank Worthing as the spendthrift Christopher. The piece, which was last produced here three years ago by John Drew and Maude Adams, is full of exceedingly funny situations and has some very pretty love scenes. These scenes promise to be managed well by Mr. Worthing and Blanche Bates, who will assume the character played by Maude Adams. The next piece to be given by the Frawleys will be Pudd'nhead Wilson," Frank Mayo's great success.

Lydia Thompson has been touring of late with Mr. Edward Terry's English company, playing the part of an elderly housekeeper in the comedy, "Love in Idleness."

NEW BOOKS

Brief Comment on Good, Bad, and Indifferent Novels.

"One Man's View," by Leonard Merrick, which has appeared in serial form in St. Paul's, has been brought out very attractively by Herbert S. Stone & Co. The story is of an English barrister, who weds the daughter of an old chum. The young woman has been very ambitious, has struggled for a whole year to obtain a theatrical engagement, but without success. She does not love the barrister, but marries him in a vague sort of way and, after a few years of married life, runs away with a celebrated dramatist, who survives their elopement but a few months. In the meantime, the barrister rises rapidly, becomes a Q. C., and is knighted, but never gets over his love for his former wife, whom he comes across after a few years. She has been living with an aunt, and is patiently awaiting death from consumption, which she believes she has. The two come together—find out they love each other, also that the lady hasn't consumption at all, and then the story ends leaving the reader to suppose that they existed happily ever after. This tender supposition is the salvation of the novel—being altogether unexpected.

A comparatively new field of literature is opened up in "Tales of the Sun Land," by Verner Z. Reed (Continental Publishing Co.) The book contains a number of short sketches, the scenes of which are laid in the southwest, in the valley of the Rio Grande. One of the best is "In the Caverns of Ulo," a narrative of a half-breed Mexican, who accidentally comes across the subterranean dwellings of his maternal ancestors. He is made king of the tribe, marries a beautiful young woman, who subsequently dies from the bite of a sea snake. After an attempt to convert the Ulos to Christianity, the young fellow returns to Mexico. He afterwards seeks to refind the caves, but without success. The other narratives are full of startling and romantic adventure.

The scene of Amelia E. Barr's new novel, "Prisoners of Conscience" (The Century Co.) is in the Shetland Islands, and the characters are simple fisherfolk, brought up in the strictest tenets of Calvinism and hedged about, as the author says, with the "phantoms of a gloomy creed." It is in this unhappy condition that the hero and heroine struggle through many years until they finally find peace in a milder and more reasonable belief. The story which has been published in briefer form in "The Century Magazine," is most naturally written, and is illustrated by Louis Loeb, who was sent to the Shetland Islands to make the drawings.

One of the most satisfactory of recent novels is "The Sun of Saratoga," by Joseph A. Altsheler (D. Appleton & Co.) It is a romance of the revolution, touching on the surrender of Burgoyne, and is told in the first person by a young officer of the patriot army. Whigs and Tories, British officers and soldiers, Hessian hirelings, patriots, spies and traitors, are all brought in the movement, and secret midnight expeditions, sudden attacks, surprises, triumphs, and defeats follow one another in startling succession. A consistency of movement with the cleverly colored character sketches is the chief charm of the story.

"A Galahad of the Creeks," by S. Levett-Yeats (D. Appleton & Co.) is another of the many stories of the far East. The creeks are the tributaries of the Iramadi, and the Galahad is an Englishman who goes to the Orient to occupy a government position and falls into troubles as many and devious as the creeks themselves. He is finally killed by a native, and a lot of trouble which threatens to be is happily averted. Another story in the book, "The Widow Lamport," is also a tale of India, well written and dowered with an altogether unconventional ending.

Mr. John Lane of The Bodley Head, has brought out a new series called the Bodley Booklets. The first of these is Max Beerbohm's "The Happy Hypocrite," which appeared last year in the "Yellow Book." Mr. Beerbohm terms the Hypocrite a fairy tale for tired men. To make a somewhat decadent comparison, "The Happy Hypocrite" may be likened more than anything else to a tiny sylvan lake with little frogs floating about on water lily leaves who say something quaint, very quaint, and then flop into the water.

"The Jessamy Bride," by F. Frankfort Moore (Herbert L. Stone & Co.), may be termed a companion volume to "The Impudent Comedian." It resembles it in style and general movement, and introduces as principal characters Goldsmith, Johnson, Garrick, Sir Joshua Reynolds and other worthies of the time. The book is interestingly and is refreshingly written. The quaint customs and phrases of the days when Goldsmith lived and wrote, and the immortal Woffington ruled the realm of comedy are cleverly woven into the tale.

"Sister Jane," by Joel Chandler Harris (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), is, according to the title page, "a narrative of certain events and episodes transcribed from the papers of the late William Wornum." Indeed, "Sister Jane" is altogether a narrative, a series of sketches of Southern life drawn in Mr. Harris' very happy manner. It makes delightful reading, full of the charm of simple existence, and may be likened more than anything else to an old-fashioned garden filled with the flowers of yesterday.

Sir George Gray and Premier Seddon of New Zealand are old friends. They met recently in London, where both had gone to see the jubilee. It was in the House of Parliament, and a flight of steps had to be descended by the aged statesman, who, after saying good-bye to his protege, set about the task with caution. Seddon, who is a very strong man, solved the difficulty. He bodily lifted the veteran in his arms and carried him to the bottom of the steps.

"The Beautiful Miss Brooke," by Z. Z. which stands for Louis Zangwill (D. Appleton & Co., publishers), tells of a young Englishman who falls in love for the first time with Miss Brooke, an American art student. Miss Brooke has already experienced the gentle passion some hundred times over, and is an adept at handling it. The end of it all, as may be expected, is the disillusionment of the young man, brought about by Miss Brooke herself.

Du Maurier's pen and pencil sketches of William Dean Howells, have been brought out in a new edition by Harper and Brothers. Before the appearance of "Trilby" these sketches attracted much attention, but since the advent of the famous novel they have enjoyed an almost unprecedented popularity. Mr. Howells' sketch of Du Maurier is written with much feeling, and alludes to the novelist and his work in a most sympathetic manner.

A new edition of Laura Bride Powers' "The Missions of California" has been published by Mr. William Doxey, and in view of the recent and prospective mission centennials it is timely reading. Miss Powers makes a strong plea for the preservation of the old mission buildings—all that is left of the pastoral times of California.

MAGAZINE NOTES

Weak Tea Tales in the Big Monthlies—Amelie Rives' Pig-Killing.

"Incredible as it may sound," announced the Editor sententiously, "there's a good story in the 'Century.'"

"Your sarcasm is lost on me," returned his wife, looking up from a pile of 'copy.' "I had an impression that American short stories were the best published."

"Gentle soul," replied her husband, "it is evident you are not reading the magazines with the attention their illustrations deserve. My emphasis is revoked by the fact that I've religiously gone through the five great monthlies and find that Maurice Thompson's 'Defense by Resurrection' alone has plot and interest. Don't imagine that tale is a spellbinder either," he added. "It's greatest virtue is its superiority to the others."

"Good stories are hard to find," suggested the Editor's wife. "Maybe they are the best sent in.

"Nonsense," declared the Editor. "Read the Sunday 'Sun.' You will find in it half a dozen brisk, spirited yarns every week—stories with blood and life in them, told directly and vividly. When I eulogize Thompson's tale I wish to be understood as speaking comparatively—its advantage is being a real episode, though the plot is not symmetrically developed and the point is not sufficiently accentuated. Yet there is intention in the narrative, which is more than can be said for 'A Life Tenant' in the 'Atlantic.' That is a futile attempt at depicting frontier life and is absolutely without a flavor of reality. The writer attempts to describe two people, a man and a woman, both of striking individuality, and only presents a brace of inventebrate puppets."

"Maybe the story is true and the writer a Western woman," interrupted the Editor's wife, whose criticisms have been confounded occasionally by localities.

"That is not impossible," returned the Editor, "however unnecessary. The point is that the story as printed does not produce the impression of reality. Another reckless piece of story telling is 'An Argonaut' in the 'Century.' The problem there is interesting but is inadequately handled. Unless one is gifted with tenderness and power it is little use attempting such dramas, for they require the rarest comprehension and sympathy—the gifts of genius."

"A certificate of genius to accompany every manuscript,' suggested the Editor's wife, ironically. "That is surely a fatuous criticism.'

"You misunderstand me," corrected the Editor. "To do justice to such a theme as the separation of a wife and a husband, and their subsequent reunion followed, as here, by a second separation requires a capacity to set before you vividly the type and manner of the man so he be a real entity to you, then the skill to let you know truly what it all meant to him. You cannot get that effect unless the situation means something equally serious to the writer.

"The 'Cosmopolitan' has a tale by Amelie Rives—surely she has the story teller's gift," said his wife.

"That is the tale of a pig killing, followed by a scene in a hospital with a dissection for climax," explained the Editor. "I've really given myself trouble over that story trying to decide why it was written, and then the wherefore of its publication. True, the slaughter of the pigs is most vividly depicted—one is given the shrieks, the blood, and all the attendant horrors—with a background of snow to set forth the color effects. The little girl and her paper dolls in the hospital and the gentle love making of the young doctor, which forms the second scene, strike one as tame after the pork episode, but the denouement in which the heroine's weak little heart is handed to her quondam lover in the dissecting room is quite horrible enough for the preface. In the same magazine, however, there is a tale by Robert W. Chambers which is distinguished by ease of manner and skill in workmanship. It is only an installment, however, for the conclusion is deferred a month, an exasperating condition which enrages one almost as much as the manner in which the 'War of the Worlds' is doled out. There is a story for you."

"Why cannot 'Harper's' and the 'Century' persuade H. G. Wells and Morley Roberts, who often writes a strong story, to contribute,' 'asked his wife.

"There seems to be a preference among the editors for cold tea stories," he explained. "Now 'Harper's' has a flabby attempt at humor. Miss Enrita Fleason's 'Relaxations.' which turns on the idiosyncrancies of an old maid in a Brittany boarding house. 'A Portrait by Cabanel' is veritably a fool tale with no rhyme and less reason, though it be relieved by one admirably rendered picture by A. E. Sterner. Both yarns, flat and pointless though they be, are brilliant, however, in comparison with 'The Love of an Ideal'—an anaemic story hopelessly spun out and inaridibly flat in the same number."

"Don't grow abusive," corrected the Editor's wife, who has an objection to vehemence save when it is a personal expression. "Had you been as disappointed about 'One Fair Daughter' in the 'Atlantic' as I was you might talk that way."

"Of what especial sin did you find that guilty?" asked the Editor, lighting his pipe.

"It reminds me of a man I know who used to read half of one of Henry James' stories and then finish it off with a climax by Miss Braddon. He told me in that way alone could he read James, though he admired his prose immensely. He was one of those creatures whose mind requires a happy ending. Mrs. Kirk states a delightful situation, outlines her dramatic personae with insight and humor, evolves a situation that has an intellectual value, and just as you are wondering how the hero is to be extricated, lo! he, the plot and the heroine are drowned in treacle and precipitated into one another's arms—it's a savage waste of good material."

"There is a story of W. C. Morrow's in 'Lippincott's' that you will find clever," put in the Editor. "A fantastic tale like others in the 'Ape-Idiot' series—done very conservatively, too—no interludes or prolixity. Talking of tales, though, read the 'Mountain Moloch,' a story of adventure which makes Lippincott's' novel this month. It has blood and action to spare, though one cannot help thinking a more imaginative writer would have done better with the Phoenicians who inhabited the mysterious island of Karana. They should have been dowered with a variety of extraordinary weapons, or, at least, Vance, the hero, should have devised some more artistic method of precipitating the slaughter of priests than by the mere use of a revolver."

"You are hard to please," interrupted his wife, yawning; "but, my dear, I promised to have this copy ready first thing in the morning."

With which the Editor proceeded to cut the leaves of the last "Yellow Book.

BOOK NOTES

Two new numbers of Appleton's Town and Country Library (D. Appleton & Company) have made their appearance. "Arrested," by Esme Stuart, and "A Spotless Reputation," by Dorothea Gerard. Both novels are well constructed, the plots well defined, and the dialogue bright and interesting.

The prose works of William Wordsworth have been brought together in chronological order for the first time in a new edition by Macmillian & Co., edited by William Knight. The edition which is in two volumes contains the entire prose work of the poet, much of which has never before been separated from the volumes of verse.

In "A Marital Liability" (J. B. Lippincott Company) Elizabeth Phipps Train has written a clever and agreeable story. There are a number of highly dramatic situations in the tale, and the dialogue throughout is bright and entertaining.

The First Congregational Church has ordered one thousand boxes of Townsend's California Glace Fruits to present to the Christian Endeavorers from Ohio, Michigan and Indiana.

TURF TOPICS

Yearling Sales — Summer Racing in California — Gentlemen Riders.

The sales of thoroughbred yearlings have continued in New York, the most notable lots being the brother to the dead champion Morello, which was purchased by Mr. R. W. Walden for $2,550, and the brother to Ornament, the best three-year-old of the season, which Mr. J. S. Curtis, the South African millionaire, bought for $10,100, the highest price paid for any yearling this season. The same gentleman was also the purchaser of the brother to Henry of Navarre at $2,600, and he has been buying pretty freely during the sale season. Mr. Curtis has been an owner and breeder to some extent in South Africa, and now proposes to keep a string of racehorses in this country, and also to operate a breeding establishment in Kentucky. He will be a welcome accession to the ranks of turfmen.

Thanks to the good figure obtained for Ornament's brother the Beaumont Stud, Kentucky, has secured the highest average, namely, $1,088, at the sales this season to date. Eighteen youngsters were disposed of from its paddocks, nearly all of them being the get of imp. Order, now at Rancho del Paso in this State.

It will be remembered that Mr. Haggin bought Victorine, the dam of Ornament, last fall at the same time that he purchased Order.

Mr. Haggin has made arrangements to have about fifty of the yearlings that were unsold at the Rancho del Paso auction sale in New York broken and put to preliminary work at Monmouth Park, presumably with the intention of making private sales as opportunity offers, as it is contrary to his policy to take any active part in racing himself nowadays.

American thoroughbreds have done sufficiently well in England this season to encourage a belief that, if a reasonable number of well selected youngsters were shipped across the water by some of the leading breeders of this country, they would command attention. Everything would depend, however, on how the attempt was carried out, the great thing to be avoided being a rush of stock at the outset.

The success of Mr. G. B. Hulme's harness horses at several of the principal English shows this summer has favorably impressed the European buyers of horses, and there is no doubt that American-bred horses of all kinds are getting a name on the other side that will have a good effect in the immediate future.

The "Spirit of the Times" makes some pertinent editorial comment on the proposal, now no longer before the public, to establish a track for summer racing in this neighborhood. Turf interests in the East and Middle West have suffered severely through the existence of tracks which have been operated solely for gambling purposes, and it is therefore the duty of people in California, who wish to have sport for its own sake and the good that it is capable of doing to the people, especially to those who are interested in the legitimate and highly interesting business of horse-breeding to nip such schemes in the bud. It is needless to say the "Spirit" is satisfied that nothing but harm would result from the opening of a summer campaign in the vicinity of this city. Fortunately the idea has now entirely collapsed.

The efforts that have been made in the East and Canada to promote races for gentlemen riders this season have not apparently been rewarded with success. This is in every way a pity, as anything that tends to keep the blood of the true sportsman, as distinguished from the mercenary adventurer of the Turf, in good health and active circulation, is beneficial to the best interests of racing. It is however a mistake to suppose that an occasional offer of a prize will provide for this class of event. Race-riding requires constant practice and can only be undertaken by men in hard condition. At present men who meet the requirements are scarcely to be found, but, if the racing associations would make some attempt to provide frequent scope for gentlemen riders on the flat and over the sticks, things might be otherwise. In California the trouble generally has been that too short notice has been given when a race of the kind is introduced, and anyone wanting to take part in it has had to beg or borrow a steed for the purpose. A few small purses for gentlemen riders sprinkled through the season's programme might induce men, who covet distinction in that line, to have a horse or two of their own, which is really wnat is wanted to give this branch of sport real life.

Adverting to remarks made in a recent issue regarding the amount of money won by the get of first-class stallions, it may now be mentioned that the Rancho del Paso stud horse imp. Sid Modred has sired in seven seasons (1890-1896), in America, horses that have won $786,323. He is now 20 years of age, and Mr. Haggin has placed his son Uncle Jess, out of Preciosa, by imp. Glenelg, in the stud.

"Turf, Field and Farm" is authority for the statement that John Splan has discarded the overdraw check rein and maintains that an animal can go faster rigged with a side check, as it leaves the head perfectly free. It will be interesting to see whether this example is followed to any extent by other drivers. The overdraw check is unquestionably the most unnatural and unsightly gearing that was ever devised for the harness horse, but whether fast trotters can be developed without it as a general rule, and, perhaps more important still, whether their drivers have the horse skill to manage them without it is another question. One thing is perfectly certain, and that is, that were the overdraw check given up, there would be far fewer trotters crippled in the back than there are at present. A look at the horses' faces when they are on the track tells the tale plainly enough.

BENEDICT.

In its Paris edition the New York Herald" recently published an interesting article on the Bloodhound, including some valuable information obtained from Mr. Edwin Brough, the first President of the new Bloodhound Association of England.

Mr. Brough has the finest kennel of bloodhounds in the world. He has for many years been their principal breeder and is recognized as the greatest living authority on these hounds.

"I trust," said Mr. Brough, "that the work of the association will dispel some popular illusions in regard to bloodhounds which appear to have been current from time immemorial. To take one example; many people believe that the bloodhound is a savage brute which, after hunting and overtaking a man, would attack and tear him limb from limb. This is simply amusing to any one who undertsands the tractability of the breed, for the bloodhound is the most docile and affectionate of hounds. He is quite satisfied with overtaking his quarry, when the quarry is a man, and instead of savaging him, as many people suppose, will simply wag his tail and lick his hand with pleasure.

"They used to call all sorts of things bloodhounds in America, but so far as I can learn, the animal chiefly used in the Southern States was the foxhound of the country, perhaps sometimes crossed with what was called the Cuban bloodhound. At any rate, I think it pretty certain that there were no bloodhounds in the United States when I first sent some over in 1888.

"Probably the name of the bloodhound has also had something to do with keeping up the popular illusion as to its savage qualities. It has a ferocious sound, but according to Comte le Couteulx de Canteleu the name was given it simply to denote a hound of pure blood, just as you would speak of an English racer as a blood-horse."

One of the dangers to the continued vitality of the breed which Mr. Brough mentioned is the difficulty of obtaining fresh blood, most of the best known hounds at the present time being closely related. He himself has endeavored to counteract this trouble by introducing the blood of the Southern hound. He also bought some hounds from the kennels of Comte le Couteulx de Canteleu, who kept some pure English bloodhounds for many years. These hounds were of the English blood, but had the advantage of having been bred for several generations in France.

For the future, however, Mr. Brough looks hopefully to America, where the bloodhound cult is also steadily advancing. The hounds in America have, of course, either been sent from England, or bred from imported dogs, but he believes that in time the interchange of hounds between England and America, which have been bred under different climatic conditions, will prove a healthy substitute for the introduction of really fresh blood.

TO THE PIANIST.

O maid with black, abysmal eyes,
That glint like stars in southern skies;
Whose face is as the lily's fair,
And crown'd by raven-color'd hair;
I know not which I most adore,
The Master's chant upon the score,
Which rings beneath thy finger tips,
The sweetly smiling, pucker'd lips,
Or—God forgive if 't be a sin—
To love a rarely classic chin,
That tapers with dimpl'd grace
To beautify an angel's face!
To see thy matchless form forebent
And touch the golden instrument,
The lifeless keys of which obey
Thy sweet caress with sweetest lay—
Would set the hearts of saints on fire,
And make them rave with wild desire;
And thrice would make them cry "encore!"
And vow a lasting "Je t' adore"!

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

The Marquis of Lorne, when Governor-General of Canada, was present at some sports held on the ice of the St. Lawrence. Though wrapped in furs he felt the cold acutely, and was astonished to see an ancient Indian meandering around barefooted, enveloped only in a blanket. He asked the savage how he managed to bear such a temperature when he had so little on. "Why you no cover face?" inquired the Indian. The Marquis replied that no one ever did so, and that he was accustomed to have his face naked from birth. "Good," rejoined the Prairie King, "me all face," and walked away.

Though Colonel Watterson is a great speech-maker, he is not given to after dinner oratory. Called on recently for a talk after a big meal, he compared his role to the comfort of Daniel's position in the den of lions. "After Daniel had decided that escape was impossible," said the Colonel, "tradition tells us he folded his arms and turned upon the ferocious beast which was licking his chops preparatory to devouring him, and he said: 'There is one comfort, anyhow. After this meal there won't be any speech-making.' "

A missionary bishop who attended the Episcopal convention at Winnipeg as a delegate from Farthest North, stated on beginning his address, that he spoke for himself and for a brother bishop who could not be present because his diocese had gone to the dogs. There was a thrill of surprise at this. "He went out among the Eskimos, did our brother," explained the bishop, "and built a church out of whale ribs and walrus hide. Alas, the food supply gave out. The dogs grew famished and literally eat the church."

Bishop Potter visited a brother prelate last summer at a popuar seaside resort. As the reverend gentlemen were walking home from the Sunday morning service, they could not fail to notice the crowds of bathers in the surf, clad and unclad in all manner of costumes. The resident prelate turned to his visitor, saying, with a sigh: "What should you do if you were confronted by a problem like that in your diocese?" "Brother," Bishop Potter quietly replied, "this is not my see!"

The distinction between the professional and the amateur is very strictly drawn in England. Lord Hawke, one of the cleverest of the gentlemen's team of cricketers, invited a prominent professional to have lunch with him in the "gentlemen's pavilion." A colleague of his lordship's objected to the presence of the professional, whereupon Hawke turned to his guest. "Then, sir," he said, "since I cannot entertain you here, perhaps I may have the pleasure of lunching with you."

A gentleman of the clerical persuasion and a drummer scraped acquaintance in a railway car, when the latter, after the manner of his kind, boasted much of his success in his profession. Finding his listener apparently well posted in commercial operations, the drummer was led to inquire what line he was traveling in. "Me?" said the divine, "Oh, I'm in the spiritual line." "That so?" said the drummer, "what a devil of a business that whisky trust is getting to be."

A certain eminent practitioner of the early California days, noted as much in Placerville in the early fifties for a habit he had of sucking lozenges as for his eloquence, was defending a murder case. He was standing with a bullet in one hand, and the usual lozenge in the other, when, suddenly, in the midst of a fine burst of eloquence, his face fell, and in a tone of agony he cried: "Gentlemen, I've swallowed the bullet!"

The better half of a leading sausage merchant in one of the local markets is much given to deploring the feeble health of her spouse. Being kindly questioned as to how the old man was doing, she answered: "Oh, he's much about the same; he don't sleep good and he ain't got no appetite," adding, with the knowledge gained in her trade, "but then, as I always says to him, it ain't no use putting good meat into a bad skin."

Bulls are not absolutely confined to Ireland. According to "Law Notes" of England, an English judge in sentencing a prisoner recently said: "Are you aware that for these repeated breaches of the law it is in my power to sentence you to a term of penal servitude far exceeding your natural life? And, what is more, I feel very much inclined to do it."

CHARLES F. CROCKER.

The reports coming from the physicians and friends in attendance upon Charles F. Crocker, vice-president of the Southern Pacific Company, do not hold out encouragement that the stricken man will ever again resume his place in active business affars. That his life may be prolonged probably expresses the full extent of the present hopes of his friends and family.

The prominent position held in this community by Colonel Crocker justifies more than a passing reference to the man, and an acquaintanceship extending over twenty odd years qualifies the writer to speak with some accuracy of the sterling qualities that were distinctively his. There exists among men a kindly custom which draws over the frailties and shortcomings of a friend the curtain of forgetfulness when disease assails or death intrudes. Immediately the blow falls, friends of the stricken man speak only of the merits that were his, extol the virtues he possessed, and discharge from memory every thought of human imperfection.

There is little need for this kindly concealment in the case of Colonel Crocker. Few young men inheriting great wealth have been as unassuming as he. His was a frank, open, manly character; abrupt at times, perhaps, but it was the abruptness that is ever the handmaiden to frankness; quick to resent, perhaps, but it was the quick and honest resentment that will not temporize with injustice, tolerate an imposition, or yield to demands that are unusual or outrageous. That it was his desire to be just, no man who knew him will deny. The principles that governed his business career were high and honorable. It was his aim to do right, and if he ever fell short of the mark whereat he shot, the fault did not lie with his intent. Throughout his life he was charitable to an eminent degree. His sympathies were easily aroused, if but convinced that the cause was worthy, and hundreds would not number the silent charities that found performance at his hands.

In his personal affairs he was generous to a fault, yet in this respect he drew a rigid line between his personal affairs and the corporate matters entrusted to his care. Here he measured his course by unbending rules of business and administered his office as a trust wherein he did not permit to creep the impulses that largely governed the conduct of his purely personal understandings. As a member of the Board of Regents of the State University, he was active, earnest, and a liberal contributor to its funds, whenever money was necessary to prosecute some scientific or astronomical investigation in this or some other country.

The season of peace that has latterly come between the railways and the public, the hushing of rancorous speech and the absence of wild attacks against the corporation, have been a theme of general comment among men who are observant of such affairs. The condition is far from being accidental. For a year or more Mr. Crocker has labored to divorce the railway from politics and from the political manipulator. He has endeavored earnestly and honestly to avoid participation in local, State or national political quarrels, and to a great extent had succeeded in the undertaking. His assurance once given out, that the corporation would not attempt the defeat or election of this or that individual, was a guarantee that so far as he could control there would be no corporate interference. It was not his nature to indulge in double dealing. Whatever of animosity he felt toward a man was plainly, tersely and strongly expressed. He had never learned the trick of pretending to admire and respect a man whom he disliked, nor to "whisper a man to death" behind his back. He was blunt, frank and open. His word was equivalent to his bond, and he was implicitly trusted by those who knew him. Thoroughly imbued with the feeling that the corporation should leave politics severely alone, having no personal axe to grind, no personal profit to make by the advancement of men to office, he was well equipped for the work carved out for him, and which he was pursuing with such earnest diligence. For the State's sake, as well as for that of the corporation, it is regrettable that robust health was not vouchsafed him, so that he might prosecute this great work to the end, and finally come to see the corporation of which he was a part become popular and free from the assaults of the demagogue and boodler.

JAPAN AND HAWAII.

The government of the Mikado has, through its representative at Washington, made a formal and polite but firm protest against the consummation of the treaty now awaiting the action of the Senate providing for the incorporation of the islands of the Hawaiian republic within the territorial domain of the United States. A similar protest is reported to have been made by the Mikado's representative at Honolulu to the government of President Dole. There has been some disposition on the part of the American people and the press to regard these protests lightly. To most of our citizens it seemed, and still seems, incredible that the Japanese should seriously set themselves to oppose the accomplishment of the projected annexation, which the people and the government of the United States undoubtedly desire, and which was avowed to be the purpose of those who overthrew the corrupt regime of Liliuokalani and erected the temporary republic in its place. It may be that the Japanese government is not altogether serious in its opposition to the treaty of annexation, for a diplomatic protest is a thing which may mean much or little, according to the intentions, not always visible, of the protesting power. It is a device of diplomacy which imports only vague designs, opening the door to the diplomatic series of purposeless protocols and the like, which may end in nothing at all, but may also end in an ultimatum. It is easy enough for the protesting party to recede from a mere protest, or to ignore it if later developments make it seem advisable to follow it up. The ultimatum is an instrument of very different import, and though there is no present prospect that the Japanese will carry their opposition so far as to threaten the use of force to prevent the consummation of our plans to annex the islands, it is not at all impossible that they may go so far, and we may yet hear of an ultimatum as a result of the polite protest of the Japanese government.

At the termination of their triumphant war with China less than three years ago the Japanese disclosed an ambition to obtain a foothold on the continent of Asia, and, from such a beginning, to develop themselves into the dominant power of the far East. The realization of this ambitious dream was summarily prevented by the prompt intervention of Russia, backed by other western powers, on behalf of China. The Czar probably derived more substantial advantages as the results of Japan's brilliant war on the sea and in the field than the Japanese themselves. The only permanent addition to the territory of the Japanese empire which resulted from that war is the island of Formosa, which was wrested from China only by the consent of Russia. Finding themselves practically excluded from the Asiatic mainland the Japanese seem to have modified their ambition. They now aspire, probably, to become a great island empire with a power on the sea sufficient to make them the dominant people of the North Pacific. The possession of the great island of Formosa, which, under their vigorous sway, may be reasonably expected to emerge from the condition of stagnation and savagery in which it remained under Chinese rule, brings them within striking range of the Philippines, and when that rich group of islands falls from the feeble hand of Spain it may well be that the hand of Japan will be reached out to grasp it. With an island empire covering the eastern coast of Asia from the frozen north to far within the tropic, the Japanese ambition to become the "Great Britain of the Orient" would be handsomely realized. And the Japanese have shown themselves to be a people sufficiently expansive to colonize and assimilate such a dominion, sufficiently progressive to redeem and administer by modern methods the great island tracts now given over to barbarism, and sufficiently valorous to hold what they acquire, or, at least, to give good cause for hesitation to any single power of the west which might contemplate the advantages to be achieved by assailing them on sea or land.

To the realization of such a scheme of empire the possession of the Hawaiian Islands, while not essential, to be sure, would nevertheless be an immense advantage. If to the ownership of the long chain of islands which skirt the eastern coast of Asia could be added the control of the only group in the North Pacific, lying midway between that coast and the western shores of the American Continent, the power so endowed would be the unquestionable mistress of the world's greatest ocean. If there are among our statesmen and legislators some who are unable to perceive the value of the Hawaiian group, for both military and commercial purposes, there are not probably any among the statesmen of Japan who are similarly blinded. The prize is worth trying for, and the diplomatic protests filed at Washington and at Honolulu are the first notes in the game.

The promptness and the eagerness with which the Japanese government seized upon the occasion of some trifling dispute, over a question of the rights of some Japanese immigrants to Hawaii, to embroil the feeble government of the Hawaiian Republic in a diplomatic contest displayed the readiness of the Japanese to seek troubled waters in which to conduct their fishing operations; and their promptness in sending ships of war to Honolulu showed their readiness to apply force to the island government if a suitable occasion offered. The subjects of the Mikado have gone to Hawaii in large numbers to furnish the labor for the industries of the islands which the decaying Kanaka race was unable to supply. They are second, in the population of the islands, only to the Kanakas themselves. If it were a question of dealing with the government of the islands alone there is not much room for doubt that the islands would fall an easy prey to the Japanese. But the publication of the annexation treaty has rudely interrupted the progress of whatever plans Japan may have formed in the design of acquiring the group. It is with the United States that she will now have to reckon, and she may pause, after her diplomatic protest, to consider well whether such a reckoning would be to her advantage. She is committed to nothing as yet, but there is in the protest filed with the Secretary of State at Washington an ominous statement that Japan will consider any disturbance of the status quo of Hawaii as threatening the continuance of the present relations of the great powers bordering on the Pacific. It may seem to most Americans absurd to suppose that the Japanese should contemplate a conflict with the United States. It will be recalled by the thoughtful that three years ago it seemed equally absurd that they should court an armed collision with the giant power of China. Yet within a few months the power of China was prostrate before the vigorous arms of Japan, and Pekin was glad to purchase a humiliating peace, the price of which is not yet paid, though considerably reduced by the interested efforts of Russia. We do not look for any such result from any war which the Japanese may elect to wage against us; but there is, as we have had occasion to point out, too much of the Chinese character in our own military administration, and a victory over Japan would be costly and long delayed. The brunt of such a contest would necessarily fall on our navy, and in the Pacific ocean the Japanese naval force is superior to ours. If the Japanese should conclude to land a force and occupy Honolulu we would find ourselves without means to expel them at once, and we would undoubtedly be called on to defend our own coast against attack. The Japanese staff is probably as well informed as to our Chinese-like arrangements for the defense of San Francisco as it was of the similar condition of China herself three years ago. We still have, however, good gunners on our ships, though we have dispensed with them for our shore guns, and it might be well for us, if there is any prospect of war, to keep the Oregon at home instead of sending her to Honolulu.

TIME TO WORK FOR A NEW CHARTER.

The question presented to the people of San Francisco, at the election of last November, of the adoption or rejection of the municipal charter then submitted to them was second in importance only to the other question then presented of the adoption or rejection of the programme of Mr. Bryan, Mr. Altgeld and their following for the conduct of our national government. The Charter then proposed was rejected by the voters by a narrow majority. It was opposed, as every such proposition will be opposed, by all those who are interested in the perpetuation of a species of municipal misgovernment of which boss rule is the principal feature, and in which the spoils of office are deemed to be the primary purpose of government. But this class of voters were not sufficiently numerous to compass by themselves the rejection of the proposed charter. If the instrument, as drawn and submitted by the latest Board of Freeholders, had been such as to commend itself to the body of good citizens who constitute a majority of the voters of San Francisco, it would have triumphed over the most determined opposition of the adherents of boss rule and the parasites on the city and county service. But the proposed instrument was not a good charter, though it received the support, more or less cordial, of almost half —and that the better half—of our citizens. It bristled with defects which seemed to many to be only too liable to result in expensive litigation and wearisome delay before a working municipal government could be set up under its provisions. The Board of Freeholders who drew up the instrument undoubtedly did their duty as best they could under the circumstances under which they worked, but their handiwork showed the effects of haste, and of the spirit of compromise between conflicting opinions which arises when time for full discussion and elaboration is lacking. The result was that when the citizens came to vote on the proposed charter there were many who, though heartily desirous of a change for the better in our municipal government, preferred to take the chances of another year or two under the antiquated Consolidation Act and its extensive growth of judicial interpretation and special legislation, rather than throw away the opportunity of securing a good and lasting Charter. There were enough citizens of this opinion to secure the rejection of the proposed Charter when their votes were added to those of the citizens who are sure to oppose any change.

But the need of a change in our system of city government and the demand for it are just as great as ever. Immediately after the late election there was considerable discussion of the advisability of holding a special Charter election, so that a new Board of Freeholders might be set to work at once, and with ample time, to prepare an instrument which would escape the fate of its predecessor at the hands of the voters, but the discussion seems to have died out without result, though the interest in the movement has not died. The Merchants' Association continues its labors in the cause, and Mayor Phelan loses no opportunity to impress on the people the necessity for improvement in our municipal methods. But there is an apparent lack of any effort looking to immediate action.

In this, as in every other public movement, the real work that must be done lies in the education of the ignorant and indifferent among our citizens. They must first be impressed with the importance of the question, and then there must be explained to them the immediate and lasting advantages that will accrue to the city of San Francisco if its municipal affairs can be conducted under an honest and business-like government. To provide such a government a Board of Freeholders should be chosen with the greatest care, and at the earliest possible moment, in order that the maximum time may be allowed them for their labors, and the maximum time may be available for a full discussion and complete explanation of their work before the people are called on to pronounce their approval or their rejection of it at the polls. It will take time to make a good Charter, it will take time to discuss it, and to educate the voters to an understanding of it. If it is good it will certainly be ratified by the people. And one desirable result of such a process of education will undoubtedly be the development of a much greater public interest in municipal affairs and the growth of a civic spirit and pride which will serve to shield the city from legislative interference with its affairs, and assure to us the right of municipal home rule.

The idea of establishing in San Francisco a zoological garden worthy of the city is distinctly in the line of municipal advancement. Money devoted to increasing or improving our attractions is money well laid out. It is an investment that not only contributes to the material pleasure and enjoyment of our own citizens, but adds greatly to the allurements that bring the stranger, the pleasure seeker and the tourist to our municipal gateway and bid them tarry with us. San Francisco has just had an experience with a visiting host of Christian Endeavorers, tourists and pleasure seekers who took advantage of the excursion rates in force, that should be profitable in more senses than one. It is estimated that these strangers left between $500,000 and $1,000,000 with our merchants, hotels, restaurants and the like. We here enjoy a summer and a winter climate that is world famous, and although we have a public park that is without a peer in any other American city, we are still far behind in the line of public amusements and attractions. We have a climate and all facilities for making San Francisco the Mecca of every tourist and pleasure seeker in America, and every step that brings us nearer to that end is a step in the line of progress that will bring benefits for generations to come. The writer has a knowledge of a merchant living in Santa Barbara county, who, besides conducting a large general merchandise business, is a man of wealth and refined tastes. Annually it is his custom to leave his home upon a purchasing tour. Although Los Angeles offers a much nearer market where he might purchase, he deals exclusively with San Francisco mercantile houses, for the reason that this city offers more amusements than does the nearer city. This is but one case in point. There are doubtless thousands of others, and as we add to these public attractions, so, too, will we add to the material welfare and prosperity of our city.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The name of Bradbury has been so much in the papers that the mention of it may seem like the suggestion of scandal. There are other Bradburys, however, especially a fine, courageous old miner, who founded the family fortunes by the discovery of the great property in Mexico that is called after him. Before descending into the southern zone, the original John Bradbury prospected the Sierras with great industry and little success. He looked north and south for mines, but found none, though he managed to obtain credit from one of the big mining machinery houses of San Francisco and also to owe them considerable money. This firm was anxious to get some of its advances back, and there were vigorous expressions of dissatisfaction when its members heard Bradbury had gone out of town without saying good-bye. He went to Mexico, and for many years not a word of him was heard. Yes, there was talk of a Californian who had discovered a great property in the realm of President Diaz, but the association was not made and the debt was relegated to the region of lost hopes. One day fifteen years afterwards there arrived at the Ferry an old man well dressed but rather rough and decided of manner. He headed for the old-time headquarters of the big mining firm, the ownership of which had undergone many important modifications in the interval, introduced himself as John Bradbury and intimated a desire to settle his account. "You don't owe us anything that I know of," said the clerk. "Look up your books," said Bradbury. They searched for five years back and discovered no indebtedness. "Perhaps you will tell when you dealt with us?" interrupted the clerk. "Oh, just about fifteen years ago," returned the old miner. They finally found the ancient ledgers of the concern and located the account. With interest added it figured up to $75,000—but, of course, was outlawed half a dozen times over. Promptly Bradbury pulled a check book out of his pocket, filled out a blank for the whole amount, signed it and tossed it carelessly to the cashier. "Maybe I'll need a little credit, as I have to get some expensive machinery for my mine," he said, as he left the office. "You can have anything we've got, sir," returned the manager of the company, "until the members of this firm are bankrupt."

The Bradbury mine is one of the great metal producers of the world and still, in spite of the millions that have been taken out, produces over $150,000 per month —surely a sufficient income to indulge vagaries on.

The State University has secured by the generous donation of Mr. C. P. Huntington a collection of manuscripts, official and otherwise, printed books and pamphlets, bearing on the history of California in the last and present century. Space does not admit of a detailed catalogue of even the most interesting of these treasures, which had been gathered together by Colonel J. L. F. Warren and added to by Mr. Robert E. Cowan of this city; but when it is said that no literary collection of a like character, save that of Bancroft, has ever been put together, it will be understood how inestimable is the value of Mr. Huntington's gift. Moreover, many of these records have so far remained sealed to historians, and will therefore afford new material for writers of the chronicles of California. Altogether there are some 4,000 separate manuscripts covering 12,000 pages, 600 books, bound and unbound, and 3,300 pamphlets, all of which will now be put in order as to binding, classified, indexed and catalogued, under the supervision of the University Librarian, Mr. J. C. Rowell, so as to be in the best possible shape for purposes of reference. This generous gift is an index of Mr. Huntington's feeling for California, which, but for newspaper attacks, would have ere this expressed itself in benefits even more substantial than the beautiful waterfall in Golden Gate Park, for which he subscribed so liberally some years ago at the suggestion of the late W. W. Stowe.

The Bohemian Club's midsummer jinks, high, low and otherwise, comes off a week from to-night in the redwoods about Guerneville, and Care is to be buried with all appropriate rite and ceremony. The club will officially take up its quarters in the camp Saturday morning, but the vast majority of the members are already domiciled in a little canvas city of tents upon the spot. The Bohemians take with them their club servants, their mixers of drinks, their chef and entire cuisine staff, and it is safe to say that the rooms on Post street will be quite deserted all of Saturday and Sunday. These summer outings of the Bohemian Club are one of the features of San Francisco social life, and have been celebrated in fiction and magazine articles all over the English-speaking world. It is chiefly by this means that the club has become one of the best known organizations in either England or America, and there is not a member on its rolls who would care to miss the few days' sojourn in camp. I understand that Charles Dickman is to be the sire of the low jinks, which is only another way of saying that it will be an uproarious and unqualified success. Mr. Dickman has introduced a dance by some of the members—Frank Owen, Fred Greenwood, George DeLong and others—which is calculated to bring down the house, or, more correctly speaking, the grove of redwoods and sugar-pines that surround the ampitheater. Mr. H. J. Stuart has been chosen as the sire of the high jinks, and will make an effort to get together "the greatest aggregation of talent ever seen in this country." Altogether his high jinks promises to be one of the most notable in the history of the club. It is given out that it will be largely musical in character.

Without one single hitch or mishap the Southern Pacific Railroad in eight days delivered into this city 24,000 Endeavorers from Ogden, over 900 miles of single track traversing very heavy grades, 10,000 more from California points, and 6,000 from Oregon, Washington and Arizona, in all some 40,000 people, with an enormous quantity of baggage. This record far surpasses anything before undertaken on our railway system, and, in fact, doubtless the highest previous figures. The officials are justly proud of the performance, which claim has never before been equaled in railway an The achievement illustrates what has often been serted by Eastern managers, that the Southern Pacific is one of the most admirably handled railroads in the world, and that the discipline and method observed and enforced throughout its great system are worthy of the highest commendation rather than of the vulgar abuse in which certain influential papers indulge when alluding to the company's affairs.

The visit of Candidate W. J. Bryan to Southern California is declared to have precipitated more jealousies among the members of the party than anything that has occurred there in years. The true-blue Silverites were determined that only the loyal should have the honor of his acquaintance, and of snubs and snubbing there was no end. In San Francisco the Silver League passed its days shivering lest the Democrats of the State Central Committee should come within hailing distance of the great man. The detachment of representatives detailed to escort Bryan aroun could only communicate with him by telephone. Whenever one of them got near enough to see the candidate through an opera glass the Silver Committee made themselves into a wall and shut out the view of his imperial person. However, the odds may have been reversed by the final episode of the little drama, for Chairman Alford rode from Sacramento to Ashland with Bryan and had lots of time to tell him the newest stories about his friends.

The Fish and Game Commissioners are getting a few large contracts on their hands, by all accounts, that are likely to keep them going just when local sportsmen are sallying forth in their might to reap the benefits of State control of fur, fin and feather. But if the work of the Commission be of the arduous, it is relieved by many pleasurable and at times comic effects. Of the latter kind is an incident reported from the further recesses of Marin County. It seems that a town-bred probationer in the sporting world recently established himself on the ranch of a friendly farmer, transporting thither a perfect arsenal of the most approved types of every sort and kind of deadly weapon. In one of his forays the family shorthorn fell a victim to misplaced skill on the part of the sportsman, and it at once became a question with the thrifty hayseed how he was to recover his loss. A bright thought struck him that the Commission was by law established for the purpose of dealing with such cases, and he lost no time in putting in a claim for damages at the cost of the State. It may be fortunate for Henry Babcock and his colleagues that they do not owe their distinguished position to the vote of the free and independent elector whose cow is no longer possessed of the vitality which insures its ability to jump over the moon.

A more serious question for the Commission, however, is the condition of affairs arising out of the serious injury to the fishing qualities of the Sacramento River through the immense quantity of debris that is being shot into the upper reaches of the stream by the Iron Mountain Mining Company at Keswick, near Redding. This concern is conducting smelting operations on a vast scale, and has made an immense change in the conditions of business in Shasta County. It gives employment to a large army of workers, and the whole neighborhood would soon be up in arms if anything were done to hamper the undertaking. In the performance of their duties the Commissioners may be called upon to place restrictions in the way of the smelting works that would seriously interfere with the handling of the ore, and consequently with the livelihood of workingmen, to say nothing of the drawback to the capitalistic stockholders; and, therefore, the outcome of game preservation versus industrial development may have yet to be settled as affecting the interests of far away Shasta.

The ghosts of Mr. James Corbett and Mr. Robert Fitzsimmons—condemned for an indefinite period to go over again the scene of their deeds—have come to haunt the city. They "walk" at the Olympia—the old People's Palace, and, it must be said, do so to some purpose. It must be remembered that the veriscope pictures of the Carson affair were not taken under the same favoring conditions as were obtainable in the Corbett-Courtney "go." The camera had to be placed further from the ringside, only one attempt could be made, and there was no black background for the fighters to maneuver against. Yet, even taking all these drawbacks into consideration, it is surprising what an excellent impression of the fight the veriscope gives the spectator. The thing must be considered as a whole, not as a collection of details. Looked at from this last point of view, the pictures would leave much to be desired. There are plenty of imperfections in the films that stream across the field of vision like gigantic notes, and the oscillation is trying on the eyes. But taken as a faithful representation of "the greatest pugilistic event of the century," the veriscope is a success, and the films of the last and most important round are fortunately the best of all. The lay spectator takes away with him the impression that honors were easy until the beginning of the fourteenth round. Both men had taken turns in doing all the fighting, while at once time in the sixth and seventh rounds it even looked as though Corbett had Fitz going fast. In the middle of the last round Corbett sinks to his knee—the plexus punch is not visible to the naked eye—listens calmly and attentively till the timekeeper has counted seven seconds, starts to rise, and, to every one's stupefaction, has trouble in doing so; he shifts his hand nearer his body to gain a better brace and in so doing raises it from the floor an inch or so, leaving his body unsupported for the fraction of a second. Instantly he goes over, gasping for breath, one hand over his stomach, and the crowd rush into the ring. There is a great deal of drama about the veriscope pictures, but drama of a peculiar kind; one feels that one is looking at a picture, a fake, in a sense, and yet simultaneously one is perfectly aware of the fact that it "all did happen." The peculiarity of this double sensation is perhaps "alone worth the price of admission."

"This Animal of a Buldy Jones"

By FRANK NORRIS

We could always look for fine fighting at Julian's of a Monday morning, because at that time the model was posed for the week, and we picked out the places from which to work. Of course the first ten of the esquisse men had first choice. So, no matter how early you got up, and how resolutely you held to your first row tabouret, chaps like Roubault, or Marioton, or the little Russian, whom we nicknamed Choubersky, or Haushaulder, or the big American—"This Animal of a Buldy Jones"—all strong esquisse men, could always chuck you out when they came, which they did about ten o'clock, when everything had quieted down. When two particularly big, quick-tempered, obstinate and combative men try to occupy a space twelve inches square simultaneously, it gives rise to complications. We used to watch and wait for these fights (after we had been chucked out ourselves), and make things worse, and hasten the crisis by getting upon the outskirts of the crowd that thronged about the disputants and shoving with all our mights. Then one of the disputants would be jostled rudely against the other, who would hit him in the face, and then there would be a wild hooroosh and a clatter of overturned easels and the flashing of whitened knuckles and glimpses of two fierce red faces over the shoulders of the crowd, and everything would be pleasant. Then perhaps you see an allusion in the Paris edition of the next morning's "Herald" to the "brutal and lawless students."

I remember particularly one fight—quite the best I ever saw at Julian's—or elsewhere, for the matter of that. It was between Haushaulder and Gilet. Haushaulder was a Dane, and six feet four. Gilet was French and had a waist like Virginie's. But Gilet had just come back from his three years' army service, and knew all about the savate. They squared off at each other, Gilet spitting like a cat, and Haushaulder grommelant under his mustache. "This Animal of a Buldy Jones," the big American, bellowed to separate them, for it really looked like a massacre. And then, all at once, Gilet spun around, bent over till his finger-tips touched the floor, and, balancing on the toe, lashed out backwards with his leg at Haushaulder, like any cayuse. The heel of his boot caught the Dane on the point of the chin. An hour and forty minutes later, when Haushaulder recovered consciousness and tried to speak, we found that the tip of his tongue had been sliced off between his teeth as if by a pair of scissors. It was a really unfortunate affair, and the government very nearly closed the atelier because of it. But "This Animal of a Buldy Jones" gave us all his opinion of the savate, and announced that the next man who savated from any cause whatever "aurait affaire avec lui, oui avec lui, cre nom!"

Heavens! No one aurait voulut affaire avec cette animal de Buldy Jones. He was from Chicago (but, of course, he couldn't help that!) and was taller than even Haushaulder, and much broader. The desire for art had come upon him all of a sudden while he was studying law at Columbia. For "This Animal of a Buldy Jones" had gone into law after leaving Yale. Here we touch "This Animal of a Buldy Jones's" great weakness. He was a Yale man! Why, he was prouder of that fact than he was of being an American, or even a Chicagoan—and that is saying much. Why, he couldn't talk of Yale without his face flushing. Why, Yale was almost more to him than his mother. I remember, at the students' ball at Bullers, he got the Americans together, and with infinite trouble taught us all the Yale "yell," which he swore was a transcript from Aristophanes, and for three hours he gravely headed a procession that went the rounds of the hall bawling "Brek! Kek! Kek! Co-ex! Co-ex!" and all the rest of it.

More than that, "This Animal of a Buldy Jones" had pitched on his 'varsity base ball nine. In his studio—quite the swellest in the Quarter, by the way—he had a collection of balls that he had pitched in match games at different times, and he used to show them to us reverentlv, and if we were especial friends, would allow us to handle them. They were all written over with names and dates. He would explain them to us one by one:

"This one," he would say, "I pitched in the Princeton game, and here's two I pitched in the Harvard game—hard game that—our catcher gave out—guess he couldn't hold me" (with a grin of pride) "and Harvard made it interesting for me until the fifth inning, then I made two men fan out one after the other, and then, just to show 'em what I could do, filled the bases, got three balls called on me, and then pitched two inshoots and an outcurve, just as hard as I could deliver. Printz of Harvard was at the bat. He struck at every one of them—and fanned out. Here's the ball I did it with. Yes, sir. Oh, I can pitch a ball all right."

Now think of that! Here was this man, "This Animal of a Buldy Jones," a Beaux Arts man, one of the best color and line men on our side, who had three esquisses and five figures "on the wall" at Julian's (any Paris art student will know what that means), and who was in a fair way to be chosen to compete in the Prix de Rome concours, and yet the one thing he was proud of, the one thing he cared to be admired for, the one thing he loved to talk about, was the fact that he had pitched for the Yale 'varsity base ball nine.

All this by way of introduction.

I wonder how many Julian men there are left who remember the affaire Camme? Plenty, I make no doubt, for the thing was of a monumental character. I heard Roubault tell it at the "Dead Rat" just the other day. "Choubersky" wrote to "The Young Pretender" that he heard it way in the interior of Morocco, where he had gone to paint doorways, and Adler, who is now on the "Century" staff, says it's an old story among the illustrators. It has been bandied about so much that there is danger of its original form being lost. Wherefore it is time that it should be hardened and crystallized into type.

Now Camme, be it understood, was a filthy little beast—a thoroughpaced, blown-in-the-bottle blackguard with not enough self-respect to keep him sweet through a summer's day—a rogue, a bug—anything you like that is sufficiently insulting; besides all this, and perhaps because of it, he was a duellist. He loved to have a man slap his face—some huge, big-boned, big-hearted man, who knew no other weapons but his knuckles. Camme would send him his card the next day, with a message to the effect that it would give him great pleasure to try and kill the gentleman in question at a certain time and place. Then there would be a lot of palaver, and somehow the duel would never come off, and Camme's reputation as a duellist would go up another peg, and the rest of us—beastly little rapins that we were—would hold him in increased fear and increased horror, just as if he were a rattler in coil.

Well, the row began one November morning—a Monday—and, of course, it was over the allotment of seats. Camme had calmly rubbed out the name of "This Animal of a Buldy Jones" from the floor and had chalked his own in its place. Now, Bougereau had placed the esquisse of "This Animal of a Buldy Jones" fifth the preceding Saturday, and according to unwritten law he had precedence over Camme. But Camme invented reasons for a different opinion, and presented them to the whole three ateliers at the top of his voice, and with unclean allusions. We were all climbing up on the taller stools by this time, and Virginie, who was the model of the week, was making furtive signs at us to give the crowd a push, as was our custom.

Camme was going on at a great rate.

"Ah, farceur! Ah, espece de voleur, crapaud va, c'est a moi cette place la, Saligaud va te prom'ner, va faire des copies au Louvre."

To be told to go and make copies in the Louvre was in our time the last insult. "This Animal of a Buldy Jones," this sometime Yale pitcher, towering above the little frog-like Frenchman, turned to the crowd, and said, in grave concern, his forehead puckered in great deliberation:

"I do not know, precisely, that which it is necessary to do with this kind of a little toad of two legs. I do not know whether I should spank him or administer the good kick of the boot. I believe I shall give him the good kick of the boot. Hein!"

He turned Camme around, and held him at arm's length, and kicked him twice severely. Next day, of course, Camme sent his card, and four of us Americans went around to the studio of "This Animal of a Buldy Jones" to have a smoke-talk over it. Robinson was of the opinion to ignore the matter.

"Now, we can't do that," said Adler; "these beastly continentals would misunderstand. Can you shoot, Buldy Jones?"

"Only deer."

"Fence?"

"Not a little bit. Oh, let's go and punch the wadding out of him, and be done with it!"

"No! No! He should be humiliated."

"I tell you what—let's guy the thing."

"Get up a fake duel and make him seem ridiculous."

"You've got the choice of weapons, Buldy Jones."

"Fight him with hat pins."

"Oh, let's go punch the wadding out of him—he makes me tired!"

"Horse" Wilson, who hadn't spoken, suddenly broke in with:

"Now, listen to me, you other fellows. Let me fix this thing. Buldy Jones, I must be one of your seconds."

"Soit!"

"I'm going to Camme and say like this: 'This Animal of a Buldy Jones' has the naming of weapons. He comes from a strange country, near the Mississippi, from a place called Shee-ka-go, and there it is not considered etiquette to fight either with the sword or pistol—they're too common. However, when it is necessary that balls should be exchanged in order to satisfy honor, a curious custom is resorted to. Balls are exchanged, but not from pistols. They are very terrible balls, large as an apple, and of adamantine hardness. 'This Animal of a Buldy Jones' even now has a colleetion. No American gentleman of honor travels without them. He would gladly have you come and make first choice of a ball, while he will select one from among those you leave. Sur le terrain, you will deliver these balls simultaneously toward each other, repeating till one or the other adversaries drops. Then honor can be declared satisfied."

"Yes, and do you suppose that Camme will listen to such Tommyrot as that?" remarked "This Animal of a Buldy Jones." "I think I'd better just punch his head."

"Listen to it? Of course he'll listen to it. You've no idea what curious ideas these continentals have of the American duel. You can't propose anything so absurd in the duelling line but they won't give it serious thought. And besides, if Camme won't fight this way, we'll tell him that you will have a Mexican duel."

"What's that?"

"Tie your left wrists together, and fight with knives in your right hand. That'll scare the tar out of him."

And it did. The seconds had a meeting at the Cafe of the Moulin Rouge, and gave Camme's seconds the choice of the duel Yale or the duel Mexico. Camme had no wish to tie himself to a man with a knife in his hand, and his seconds came the next day to choose and solemnly chose a league ball—the one that had been used against the Harvard nine.

Will I—will any of us ever forget that duel? Camme and his people came upon the ground almost at the same time as we. It was behind the Mill of Longchamps, of course. Roubault was one of Camme's seconds, and he carried the ball in a lacquered Japanese tobacco-jar—gingerly as if it were a bomb. We were quick getting to work. Camme and "This Animal of a Buldy Jones" were each to take his base ball in his hand, stand back to back, walk away from each other just the distance between the pitcher's box and the home plate (we had seen to that), turn on the word, and—deliver their balls.

"How do you feel," I whispered to our principal, as I passed the ball into his hands.

"I feel just as if I was going into a match game, with the bleachers full to the top, and the boys hitting her up for Yale. We ought to give the yell, y' know."

"How's the ball?"

"A bit soft and not quite round. Bernard of the Harvard nine hit the shape out of it in a drive over our left field, but it'll do all right, all right."

"This Animal of a Buldy Jones" bent and gathered up a bit of dirt, rubbed the ball in it, and ground it between his palms. The man's arms were veritable connecting-rods, and were strung with tendons like pa[illegible]larly well-seasoned rubber. I remembered what he about few catchers being able to hold him, and I recalled the pads and masks and wadded gloves of a base ball game, and I began to feel nervous. If Camme was hit on the temple or over the heart——

"Now, say, old man, go slow, you know. We don't want to fetch up in Mazas for this. By the way, what kind of ball are you going to give him? What's the curve?"

"I don't know yet. Maybe I'll let him have an upshoot. Never make up my mind till the last moment."

"All ready, gentlemen!" said Roubault, coming up.

Camme had removed coat, vest and cravat. "This Animal of a Buldy Jones" stripped to a sleeveless undershirt. He spit on his hands and rubbed a little more dirt on the ball.

"Play ball!" he remarked.

We set them back to back. On the word they paced from each other and paused. "This Animal of a Buldy Jones" shifted his ball to his right hand, and, holding it between his fingers, delicately raised both his arms high above his head and a little over one shoulder. With his toe he made a little depression in the soil, while he slowly turned the ball between his fingers.

"Fire!" cried Roubault.

On the word "This Animal of a Buldy Jones" turned abruptly about on one foot, one leg came high off the ground till the knee nearly touched the chest—you know the movement and position well—the uncanny contortions of a pitcher about to deliver.

Camme threw his ball overhand—bowled it as is done in cricket, and it went wide over our man's shoulder. Down came Buldy Jones' foot, and his arm shot forward with a tremendous jerk. Not till the very last moment did he glance at his adversary or measure the distance.

"It is an in-curve!" exclaimed "Horse" Wilson in my ear.

We could hear the ball whirr as it left a gray blurred streak in the air. Camme made as if to dodge it with a short toss of head and neck—it was all he had time for—and the ball, faithful to the last twist of the pitcher's fingers, swerved sharply inward at the same moment and in the same direction.

When we got to Camme and gathered him up, I veritably believed that the fellow had been done for. For he lay as he had fallen, straight as a ramrod and quite as stiff, and his eyes were winking like the shutter of a kinetoscope. But "This Animal of a Buldy Jones," who had seen prize-fighters knocked out by a single blow, said it was all right. An hour later Camme woke up and began to mumble in pain through his clenched teeth, for the ball, hitting him on the point of the chin, had dislocated his jaw.

The heart-breaking part of the affair came afterward, when "This Animal of a Buldy Jones" kept us groping in the wet grass and underbrush until long after dark looking for his confounded base ball, which had caromed off Camme's chin, and gone—Heaven knows where.

We never found it.

The spinning wheel has been taken up by a New York society, and it is now quite the fad to be able to spin even as dexterously as women of a century ago. Golf is said to be indirectly responsible for the fad, and golf stockings are now no longer bought in the shops or even made to order; they are spun at home by the industrious dames of swelldom. The Princess of Wales learned to spin some time ago, and it may be that the example of her royal highness may have had something to do with the beginning of the custom in America.

Mr. Joseph H. Choate, now in prominence in the trial of the great Tobacco Trust, has an almost inexhaustive fund of good humor, and while he is able to keep himself and the court in continual amiability, he never cuts loose from the merciless satire and audacious strength of invective of which he is past master. Mr. Choate's face is youthful in expression, but marked with lines of power, his eyes are brown and quizzical; his head, covered with thick, curly hair, is round and massive and is finely if jauntily posed on an erect and active figure of more than middle height.

Herbert Spencer was not made a Privy Councilor by the Queen, and this neglect has been termed inexplicable and unpardonable, except upon the ground of sheer ignorance. Mr. Spencer's friends are agitating the question more than himself, for the venerable philosopher has a theoretical objection to titles, and has declared that were any distinction offered him he would refuse it.

Nansen, the explorer, is at present in St. Petersburg, and is said to be organizing a novel business enterprise. He is forming an international company, with a capital of 50,000,000 rubles, to exploit the riches of the Far North. On his last journey he found on the coast deposits of iron and nickel ores that are said to be enormously rich. Nansen's company is to mine and market these ores.

Senator Stewart is in training in a Washington bicycle academy, and before long expects to make his first public appearance as a scorcher. Senator Stewart is now seventy years of age and will make a striking figure on the wheel, with his long white beard, heavy white eyebrows and serious aspect, needing only the conventional scythe to make him a modern Father Time.

The Sultan, it is said, wishing to honor a European lady of exemplary character, presented her with the Ribbon of the Order of Chastity, Second Class. The feelings of the recipient were much relieved when she learned, a short time afterward, that the First Class honor is reserved exclusively for Sultanas.

THE CITY TO HAVE A ZOO

Contemplated Plans of a Menagerie at the Mission.

That a Zoological Garden has been contemplated for San Francisco is already an old story, but of late the idea has been crystalized into something like a definite and tangible shape. Professor David Starr Jordan, of Stanford University, and Professor "Jo." Le Conte, of Berkeley, have been interesting themselves in the project, and a local organization has been formed to further the scheme. This society has communicated with several of the city's capitalists and milionaires and have found them willing to contribute largely to the project, provided the city will meet them half way.

The latest move in the matter comes from the firm of Baldwin & Howell, who have offered 145 acres of Mission land to the city as a site for the proposed "Zoo." The boundaries of the proposed park are from Thirtieth street to Sunny Side, and from Stanford Heights to the Fairmount tract.

The great advantage that San Francisco would have over almost any other city in the world in the matter of zoological gardens lies in the fact of the evenness and temperature of the climate. In other cities, in New York for instance (whose "Zoo." is the largest in the world), and in London and Paris, complicated and expensive winter quarters have to be provided for the tropical animals, and special contrivances designed for the summer quarters of those whose habits is within the Arctic circle. However, it is claimed by experts on the subject that the average temperature of San Francisco is cool enough for the bear, elk and moose of the northern countries, and at the same time warm enough for the lions, elephants and hippopotami of the tropics. It will not be necessary to build winter quarters for any of the animals, unless possibly for the South American monkeys —the most delicate and sensitive little beasts known to the collector.

The tract offered by Baldwin & Howell has been carefully examined and surveyed by George Hansen, the landscape gardener, who reports most favorably upon its adaptability for the purpose intended. The tract has the further advantages of accessibility and very generous water supply. The San Francisco and San Mateo electric road passes the southeasterly corner of the property, the cable road which now terminates at Castro and Twenty-sixth streets, could be, at small expense, extended up Twenty-sixth to Diamond street, and out this street to the park, while several avenues of approach could be cheaply arranged from Mission street. Indeed, a petition has already been addressed to the Board of Supervisors asking that this be done.

Besides this, the property in question has a special value owing to the number of springs located upon it from which could be obtained almost enough water to supply the entire park. The ground has been gone over carefully with this end in view, and it is estimated that very nearly 3,000,000 gallons of water per month are available. This amount can be unquestionably increased by proper development of the springs—development which would mean a monthly saving of the city of $600—a most important consideration, by the way. Nor would there be need for any labor in the transporting of soil, loam, etc., for the beautifying of the "Zoo." grounds. The soil upon the tract offered is naturally rich, and it will require but little time to cover it with a luxuriant growth of trees and shrubs. Indeed, everything connected with the tract is peculiarly favorable for the upbuilding of a really fine "Zoo." The only wonder is that it has not been discovered sooner. San Francisco ought to have a zoological garden, as nothing has been found more attractive to visitors than a well-kept collection of wild animals.

The construction of the Balboa Boulevard from the Almshouse to Ingleside last winter and spring is a work that reflected the highest credit on our citizens, who gave of their money and their time, without hope of reward, for the benefit of the unemployed in the first instance and the comfort and convenience of the general community in the second. Space does not admit of the mention of the names of all of those who assisted in the good work of subscribing and disbursing the fund of $34,472 21, which was raised for the purpose, besides contributions of tools and materials needed in the work; but amongst the many active members of the committee in immediate control and the earnest advocates of the undertaking, Messrs. W. M. Bunker, Chairman, L. R. Ellert, John McCord, Lippman Sachs, Henry J. Crocker, C. C. Bemis, Daniel Meyer, Harold Wheeler, Herman Schussler, Hugh Craig, C. W. McAfee, Cornelius O'Connor, and last, but not least, Mayor James D. Phelan, have to be mentioned. The construction work extended over a period of three months and afforded a livelihood to a very large number of decent men, who, with their families, would otherwise have been sufferers for want of the common necessaries of life. Practical charity of this kind is excellent in its effect, whether the donors or the beneficiaries be considered. In order that the full advantages of the work may be secured to the public, it is important that provision should be made for maintaining the road in the same perfect condition that attended its completion. Very trifling expenditure is needed to keep a highway so constructed in perfect order, if drainage and surface repair are effected immediately the necessity arises. The dilatory and neglectful policy that generally prevails in such matters throughout the State is wasteful and expensive in the last degree.

M. Jacques de Morgan, Director-General of Antiquities of the Egyptian government, has made another find in the Nile valley, the value of which, according to archaeologists, cannot be over estimated. The find consists of the tomb and mummified body of the first King of Egypt, who is supposed to have reigned 4800 B. C., or almost 7,000 years ago. The tomb contains twenty-one rooms, in each of which were placed sarcophagi holding mummified remains. The mummy of the king was found in a large room occupying the center of the tomb, adorned with elaborate hieroglyphics and wonderfully drawn sketches, representing the achievements and funeral rites of the royal inhabitant. M. de Morgan, who made the discovery, is one of the greatest of Egyptian explorers. He penetrated two years ago the hidden passages of the famous pyramids of Dashur, and discovered the mummies of Amenemhart III, Amenemhart IV, and the Princess Naub-Hatep, three of Egypt's most famous rulers. In addition to this, M. de Morgan has unearthed many of the oldest records pertaining to early Egyptian history, and a large portion of the contents of the Imperial Museum of Antiquities at Gizeh evidences his success in discoveries of ancient treasure.

GEN. SHAFTER AND HIS AIDES

A Group of Distinguished Military Officers.

The recent retirement, at his own request, of Major-General James W. Forsyth was promptly followed by the assignment to the vacant command of the Military Department of California of Brigadier-General William R. Shafter, whose portrait we present to our readers to-day. General Shafter was born in Michigan and began his service as a soldier immediately after the outoreak of the civil war as First Lieutenant in the Seventh Michigan Volunteer Infantry. From this regiment he was mustered out in August, 1862, only to accept a commission as Major of the Nineteenth Michigan Infantry, in which regiment he was promoted to be Lieutenant-Colonel in June, 1863. When the government decided to organize for the Federal service the available material in the colored population, and good officers were in demand for the purpose of what was considered by many to be a very dubious experiment, General Shafter was chosen to command the Seventeenth United States Colored Infantry, of which regiment he became Colonel in April, 1864, retaining his command till he was honorably mustered out of the volunteer service in November, 1866. He had served with honor and distinction through the entire war, and at the close of the contest had achieved the brevets of Colonel in the regular service and Brigadier-General of Volunteers "for gallant and meritorious services."

When the regular army was reorganized after the civil war General Shafter went into the regular establishment as Lieutenant-Colonel of the Forty-first Infantry. In the subsequent consolidation of regiments he became Lieutenant-Colonel of the Twenty-fourth Infantry in April, 1869, with which regiment he continued to serve till he was promoted to be Colonel of the First Infantry in March, 1879, and remained in command of that regiment till his recent promotion. In all the hard frontier service during the years of Indian hostilities which followed the close of the civil war, General Shafter sustained the reputation which he had acquired during that great conflict as a brave, active and able officer. Not a little of the splendid reputation of the First United States Infantry is due to General Shafter's command of the regiment during eighteen years of its history. He came to San Francisco with his regiment in 1886, and, with the exception of a few months' absence at the time of the Pine Ridge Indian outbreak in 1890, has remained here in charge of the posts at Angel Island and the Presidio. General Shafter wears the medal of honor awarded by Congress "for most distinguished gallantry in the battle of Fair Oaks, Virginia, May 31, 1862," where, though wounded early in the action, he remained on the field till the close of the engagement.

In the choice of his personal staff officers General Shafter has been both wise and fortunate. Lieutenant Robert H. Noble, the senior aide-de-camp, was graduated from the Military Academy in 1880 and assigned to the First Infantry. He was promoted to be First Lieutenant in that regiment in 1891, and was Colonel Shafter's regimental adjutant at the time when the promotion of the Colonel made him Commanding General. The junior aide is First Lieutenant John D. Miley, Fifth Artillery, who was graduated from West Point in 1887, and came to San Francisco with his regiment in 1890. To him was assigned the responsible duty of mounting most of the heavy ordnance recently placed in position for the defense of this port, and when his regiment was transferred to the East, Lieutenant Miley was retained here to continue that duty. Both of General Shafter's aides are young officers, of the studious type, who apply themselves seriously to their profession, and, like their chief, both have had the advantage of long service in the Department of California.

The army garrisons in the vicinity of San Francisco have always been a prominent element in the public life of our community, and their relations with the citizens and the State troops have ever been most friendly and cordial. Under the command of General Shafter, which, we trust, will continue until the law provides for his retirement, we may with confidence look for a continuation of this happy condition.

THE OPINIONS OF LEANDER

'Holds Forth at Length on the Subject of "Girl."

The other morning as I was engaged in shaving myself in my rooms—I have recently taken rooms not far from the University Club and am vastly set up over it—the other morning, I say, Leander dropped in. He was in a golf suit, which he pretends is a bicycle outfit, and had but that moment returned from riding his wheel in the park.

"I say, Just," he remarked, collapsing with a groan of exhaustion among the cushions of my divan, "I say, old chap, you've got dead swell rooms here."

"Oh," said I, carelessly, as I scraped underneath my chin, "they'll do for a place to wash one's hands in."

"Come, now, don't pose; you make a guy of yourself."

"There are others," said I, and I glared at his green and red plaid stockings.

Leander curled his offending legs under him and glared back.

"Oh, well," he said—"Say, Just," he added in a moment, "what do you think of girls, anyway?'

"Do you want to make me cut myself?"

"I didn't mean to be so abrupt. But I've been thinking a good deal about girls lately."

"You have? How many? Leander, the more you think about a lot of girls and the less you think about one girl the happier you will be."

"That ain't yous?"

"I swear it.'

"But, say, Just, go on; tell me what do you think about girls, anyway."

"Girl" (I misquoted)—

" 'Girl is a monster of such hideous mien
That to be hated needs but to be seen,
But seen too oft', familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.' "

"Now, I know that's not yours."

"It's an improvement on Mr. Pope's patent, anyhow. What do 'You' think of girls, Leander?"

"No family should be without one," he answered promptly. "But I'm thinking of California girls—I mean San Francicso girls—the girls you and I know; the typical San Francisco girl, I mean."

"We know some very charming girls, Leander," said I.

"They are very charming.'

"And pretty."

"Well, I wonder—and style!"

"None in the world more stylish."

"And jolly."

"Well, I should say so."

"And clever."

"Clever as one o'clock."

"Know how to take care of themselves."

"You betcha."

"And refined—eh?"

"Steady, now."

"Ah, that's just it."

"Suppose we compare 'em with the Eastern girls of the same class."

"Oh, don't do that."

"Ah, you see, there's a difference."

"Just the barest, tiniest, little bit of a difference."

"Well, now, hold on. I don't want to say the least little thing against our girls.'

"Heavens! no."

"We know they're good, and—and—well, confound it, we know they are as straight as a string."

"I'd hit the man who'd say they weren't."

"So you would, Leander."

"But now, see here, Just, we've got to make a distinction. Of course there are girls out here who are refined to beat four of a kind—you and I and all the rest of us know that kind. They're the kind of girls whom we never talk about among ourselves, whose names you never hear mentioned in a crowd of fellows. Every fellow knows two or three of that kind of a girl."

"I know four."

"Lucky man. But they're not 'out.' "

"Never will be, thank God."

"Just', this fervor——"

"Pardon me, there are four of them I said, not one."

"Well, as I was saying, they're not society girls, and they have ideas and convictions about things. But we're not talking about those kind."

"No, let's don't."

"Those are the 'Other Kind Of Girls.' Now, mind, I say there's nothing bad about these girls who are 'out.' "

"Nothing in the world."

"They're just—well, what'll I say?—not over-refined. They're too easy going; they allow a man certain little familiarities, and their only idea of a good time is unconventionality. Now, Just, I,ll tell you what I saw the other day. Oh, you've seen it hundreds of times yourself—all the rest of us fellows have. I went with a crowd to Mrs. Ten Eyck's lawn party last Thursday. It was very small—only fifteen or twenty—and everybody was well acquainted. I was the only one there, I guess, who didn't know everybody. Well, there were a lot of girls along, young society girls—pretty young—swell, you know, and awfully nice. They called all the fellows by their first names, and allowed the fellows to do the same."

"They needn't have been ostracized for that."

"No, but what's the good of it, and then listen. After lunch they began to have what they called a good time."

"What did they do?"

"They played tag."

"No!"

"Yes, they did. Nothing serious in that, but it's just undignified. They ran around like so many tomboys, the girls did, and the fellows after them; and the girls' hair came down, and their faces would get red, and when a fellow would catch one of them he'd think it was ing of putting his arms around her, and the girl would let him; and she'd let the next man, too, and the next and the next. The fellows pull-hauled them about without the least ceremony, and upon my word, the girls even seemed to enjoy it."

I think I shrugged one shoulder here.

"Just', it suggested a—a—blessed if it didn't suggest a Sunday picnic. It was common. Now, you know these girls are all right. They're straight as strings. That's why it's so strange to see. We all went into the house afterward. Everybody paired off little by little, and towards four o'clock I found a couple in the conservatory. The fellow was smoking a cigarette—and so was the girl. Now, don't interrupt—let me tell you more about that girl. I met her and a girl chum of hers down at Monterey one Fourth of July, and in the evening just as I was saying good-night to them, they begged me to have a couple of mild cocktails sent up to 'em from the bar."

"And did you?"

"Said I would; and then had the barkeep' mix a little grenadine and bitters in cocktail glasses and put a bit of lemon peel in. They never knew the difference. Told me in the morning 'how much good it had done them'—pshaw! Now, honestly, just', what do you think of that—of the whole business, cocktails and cigarettes and pull-hauling and all?"

"Well, these girls are good girls, Leander."

"I know they are, Just; but there's something more—something better than being merely good. My servant girl is good, my laundry woman is good; but we fellows, you know, have a right to expect something better from society girls; we expect 'em—well, damn it, y know—to be refined and modest and well behaved and all that. Take any of those girls at the lawn party, how often do you suppose they've allowed fellows to kiss them?"

I scratched an ear.

"Now, isn't it rotten? And it's because these girls are so pretty, so fresh, and so clever, that it's a thousand pities they throw themselves away like that. They make themselves cheap in a fellow's eyes, when they ought to and when they could so easily make him respect them and—well—confound it, y' know, have a good influence over him. That sounds priggish, now, don't it; but where's a chap going to look for the good influence of refined associations——"

"Ahem, ahem—but, go on; I guess you're right."

"If he does not find it in the best society?"

"Well, you know where to find it."

"Where?"

" 'The Other Kind Of Girl,' the girl who don't 'come out,' who has ideas and opinions and convictions."

"That's so; I'd forgotten. Say, Just'——"

"But we fellows don't talk about them, y'know."

"They're all right, though," cried Leander.

"You bet, every time," said I. Then, after a pause, I said :

"You've a queer streak on to-day, Leander. How long is it since you've objected to a girl smoking cigarettes and drinking cocktails and permitting certain liberties? How about Flossie Delaney, and 'Tenny' Hunt, and——"

"Oh, that kind of a girl!" exclaimed Leander with a grin.

JUSTIN STURGIS.

Much alarm is being caused in Paris over the avowed intention of the Parliamentary Committee, now dealing with the Beranger Purity bill, to restrict not only the sale, but the possession of certain classes of literature and works of art. Acknowledged works, such as are exhibited in the Louvre and some classical literature, will be placed on the blacklist, and the directors of the museums and National Library will also be brought within the statute. The list drawn up includes over 100 masterpieces of the most illustrious authors of France, and imprisonment for a month to two years and fines of 100 to 5,000 francs are the penalties for lending or giving any of them away.

LAST OF THE JUBILEE

How the Streets Looked Along of March.

: London is quieting down after the maels jubilee, and is taking its breath again and over. Most of the princes and special envo turned to their respective countries and cou along the streets one hears nothing but the n and hammers and the clatter of loosened bo decorations and stands come down.

The choice spot and corner along the lin seems to have been at the intersection of St. and Piccadilly. St. James street was garland to side and was lined with Venetian masts Corinthian pillars with gold capitals. In one Queen, under the white parasol, is just p point, the Duke of Cambridge and the Prin riding at her carriage wheels. A more gen the equipage is the one taken as it turned from Westminster Bridge Road into Parliament street. The Queen's face can be seen just between the shoulders of the Prince of Wales and the Princess Christian. The picture also gives a good idea of the Hanoverian cream white horses. Those horses are from the famous Brunswick stud, the exclusive property of royalty, old as history itself and absolutely priceless. Following hard upon the Queen's carriage come detachments of some of the most popular bodies of cavalry in the English service. Despite the ill-favor into which the honorable Cecil has fallen, his troops were cheered to the echo, while the Horse Guards presented a picture of some hundred and fifty of the finest groomed and best drilled cavalry in the world.

The fourth picture shows the arrival of the Queen at St. Paul's, the foreign princes and the Prince of Wales in the immediate foreground. Incidentally it puts to confusion the bungling officials who distributed tickets of admission to the steps of St. Pauls. These had declared that there would not be sufficient room on the steps to admit the throng of distinguished foreign visitors, and in consequence many were refused. As it transpired, however, fully a hundred more could have been accommodated. One of the large empty spaces is shown on the right of the picture.

Taber, the well-known San Francisco photographer, is now established in a swell studio in London and has already won a name in the metropolis over the bas-relief pictures of which he makes a specialty. Describing a visit to Mr. Taber, a correspondent writes: "We were ushered into a huge reception-room superbly furnished, the walls paneled in green silk and ivory wood; heavy blue satin and lace curtains hung over the windows; on the floor a deep, soft carpet in a tone of moss-green; a huge Brinsmead piano in one corner; photographs of celebrities on the walls. Adjoining it, a second drawing-room, similar in style; then the operating room, finely arranged with all sorts and conditions of backgrounds. Upstairs there is a Chinese tea room—a very handsome apartment done in Oriental style with vases and hangings and screens. Taber's own office, a beautiful little room, comes next. I talked to him about London and his work. He has already made a fine picture of the Prince of Wales and of other members of the royal family, and expects to make a picture of the Queen. Her Majesty is very averse to sitting, inasmuch as her robes of state are heavy and she objects to the trouble of preparing for the artist."

THE WEEK IN PARIS

Movements of Americans in the Gay French Capital.

The one thing that is heard on the Boulevard des Nations these days—barring of course the jubilee—is President Faure's contemplated trip to Russia. It is not within the bounds of probability that there will be any opposition to it in the Chamber, as Right and Left, Radical and, Socialist and Legitimist alike recognize the tremendous significance of the President's excursion to the court of St. Petersburg. It is an occasion when all petty difficulties and political differences are to be sunk in a question of the common good, the closer union between France and Russia.

Paris is at her loveliest this month, and if ever it were good to be alive it is when one is in Paris in the summertime. But the Parisians are a peculiar people, forever running after some new thing, some new sensation, something with which to "epater la bourgioisie." Their latest fad is killing themselves. Never before was there such an epidemic of suicides. The series began on Sunday, and four were reported before nightfall. Three more occurred the next day, and four more on the next. The suicides were all the more notable because of their sensational character. One of the saddest was that of Louis Beeker, the theatrical manager, who hanged himself at St. Denis because of police interference with his play, "LaJeunnesse des Mousquetaires." Then a romantically inclined young man threw himself into the Seine because he found it impossible to secure a divorce which he was desirous of obtaining in order to marry his mistress. She drowned herself with him. When the bodies were found they were lashed together with a rope.

Then, after this, a young opera singer, only seventeen years of age, despairing of attaining fame and glory in her chosen profession, took counsel with herself and several of her friends and swallowed some paper which had been previously saturated in corrosive sublimate. She died almost immediately in dreadful agony. Nor is this list yet closed, for the "Figaro" announced four more suicides this morning. Apropos of suicides, the civic tribunal of Bavaria has handed down an important decision to the effect that a confirmed morphine fiend is not necessarily a maniac—this in connection with the self-destruction of the poet Edouard Dufois. The young fellow took an overdose of morphia, from which he never recovered, and a relation attacked his will on the ground that he was insane. The court, however, refused to break it.

The Valiant arrived at Havre the other day, having on board W. K. Vanderbilt and a party. They came on to Paris almost immediately. Another bit of gossip interesting to Americans is the proposed marriage of the daughter of Sylvanius Reed to the son of the celebrated painter Jean Francois Millet. The son has inherited his father's famous name, and it is also reported some little of his genius. The marriage promises to be extremely brilliant. The ceremony will take place at St. Pierra de Chaillot.

One of the society events of the week was the elaborate reception given by General Porter on the occasion of his installment in his new hotel. The function occasioned no end of comment and not a little dissatisfaction, in that uniforms were requested to be worn. The American diplomatic corps has not taken kindly to the idea, since they have always looked upon receptions of this nature as affairs at which uniforms could be dispensed with. What is still more irritating is the fact that General Porter himself will wear plain evening dress, since it is the privilege of his office to do so if he finds it desirable.

A good joke has been going the rounds of this diplomatic world, and much amusement has been had at the expense of the British Ambassadors because of the faux pas committed by him at the recent jubilee dinner given in the embassy. Among the guests, and, in fact, quite the guest of the occasion, was Mgr. Clave, the Pope's Nuncio at present in Paris. However, the host had forgotten that the day was a fast day. In consequence the Nuncio was obliged to send from him plate after plate of the most tempting entrees, being forced to content himself merely with a dish of ice cream. The Nuncio is said to have inquired of his neighbor and secretary, Mgr. Morosini, how it was he seemed so satisfied after the dinner, though apparently he had eaten no more than himself. "Oh," Mgr. Morosini is said to have replied, "I took the precaution to have a light lunch before coming to dinner, as I fancied just such a contre temps.' "Wise man," answered the Nuncio. "But why did you not warn me?"

CAPITAL GOSSIP

Illness of Tom Ochiltree — Senator Quay's Great "Pull."

President McKinley's appointment of Samuel J. Randall as Coiner of the Mint at Philadelphia aroused considerable antagonism among the Pennsylvania politicians. It will be remembered that Mr. Randall, who is a son of the famous Democratic tariff exponent and Speaker, was a Democrat previous to the last campaign, when he took the stump for McKinley. As a reward for this service he was appointed Coiner, a lucrative and responsible position, much to the disgust of certain old-time Republicans, who claim that the President's selection was made purely on the basis of personal sentiment.

Senator Matthew Stanley Quay is indeed a great man in Washington. A member of the House of Representatives received a letter from the aunt of a young man in Pennsylvania who wanted to obtain a government position. After extolling the virtues of her nephew, and giving the names of a number of persons who had recommended the appointment, the good aunt added that the only man in Pennsylvania who did not favor it was Senator Quay. "Indeed," commented the Congressman, "what a pity that good woman does not know that if Senator Quay was the only man in Pennsylvania who favored her nephew's appointment, instead of being the only man who opposed it, he would have got the place a month ago."

The warm weather has brought out the Senators in all the glory of their summer raiment. During the recent sugar bounty discussion there were sixty Senators on the floor, and twenty-seven different types of summer clothing were represented. Nine Senators who are placed in the milionaire list wore $3.65 Kentucky tow suits, resembling crash towels after an active service in a Turkish bath. The most noticeable suit was worn by Senator Thurston of Nebraska, who looked cool in white duck. His shirt was a pink outing affair, in vivid contrast to the duck, and for a crowning glory he wore a necktie, a thing in black and yellow, similar to those affected by Bowery ladies at Walhalla Hall.

Senator Platt of New York is one of the busiest men in the Senate, making his average working day from fourteen to sixteen hours, every moment of which is occupied with private or public business. His headquarters and home are at the Arlington Hotel, in which he has a suite of rooms fitted up to resemble the metropolitan offices of a big corporation. He has a long-distance telephone, a secretary and two typewriters, and keeps the entire force busy from nine in the morning until late in the afternoon. He is a frequent caller at the White House, but is privileged in being allowed to pass into the presence of the President through the Cabinet-room instead of through the Secretary's office.

Senator Morgan, of Alabama, who has been agitating Cuban recognition, is now about seventy-three years of age, and first took his seat in the Senate a little over twenty years ago. In addition to his sympathy with people who are, or appear to be, suffering anywhere on the globe, Senator Morgan is also a typical advocate of "manifest destiny," believing that the United States should acquire all the land, water and people in the Western Hemisphere, and thereby widen the sphere of American liberty and enlightenment. This tendency makes him ever ready to to further any plan like the completion of the Nicaragua Canal or the laying of an ocean cable to South American ports.

The serious illness of Colonel Tom Ochiltree creates something like real regret in Washington. All sorts of stories about him are being revived. Ochiltree commenced his career as a wit early, being taken into partnership by his father, a lawyer in Austin, while barely out of his teens. Young Tom, during the absence of the paternal relative, changed the firm name to read, "Thomas P. Ochiltree and father, attorneys." He fought through the war on the Confederate side, but accepted the verdict and was made Marshal for Texas by President Grant, who had taken a great fancy to him. The relations that existed caused a great deal of jealousy, and the faction opposed to Colonel Tom determined to snub him on the occasion of Grant's visit to Galveston after the South American tour. He was ignored in the reception arangements, and was not one of the distinguished citizens appointed to meet the great man. Instead of going to the ship, Ochiltree located himself behind two rows of celebrities who were doing guard duty along the edges of a crimson carpet which ran from the hotel steps to the curb. The reception committee—or part of it—was standing in the hotel door, waiting to give the General the gladsome hand. Ochiltree watched until the General and Mrs. Grant had stepped from the carriage and then he bulged through the line. He rushed down the crimson carpet, shook heartily the hand of his old friend, and after offering his arm to Mrs. Grant marched proudly through the rank and file of leading citizens to the hotel.

During his career as Marshal of Texas, Ochiltree was somewhat inattentive to the duties of the post and many complaints reached Grant declaring his protege spent his official hours skylarking around the country. He was sent for to Washington, and beguiled the time the President kept him waiting audience reading the report of the previous day's racing at Saratoga, where a horse named "Tom Ochiltree" had won second money. Grant chided him gently, saying how much he had regretted to learn of Tom's inattention. "Why, Tom," said the President, "I don't pick up a paper without finding your name. You are everywhere, sir, but in Texas, where you ought to be." Ochiltree sighed. "It's not my fault, General, if the press gets hold of my name. See, here," he continued, pulling out his paper, "I find I carried off second money at Saratoga yesterday and am said to be in fine form and faster than ever. Am I to blame if while attending faithfully to my work in Texas some confounded race horse is blasting my reputation through the country?" The answer caught the President, and Colonel Tom had a new lease of official life.

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

Of society in San Francisco there is really very little to write. The one event of importance that has happened in the immediate past was the wedding of A. H. Small and Mrs. Annie Wooster, which was celebrated at the home of the bride's parents, Colonel and Mrs. J. P. Jackson, on Sutter street. Mrs. Wooster made an exceedingly charming bride, and Mr. Small is certainly to be congratulated upon having won so fascinating and graceful a wife. The happy pair have set up housekeeping at 1920 Washington street, in a pleasant house which they have furnished together. It is just below the Goads, and commands a fine view of the bay. The wedding presents were particularly handsome, as might have been expected, for both Mr. and Mrs. Small have very large circles of friends.

Mrs. Martin is about to move into her magnificent new home on Broadway, the house Mrs. Annie Donahue had so anxiously looked forward to occupying. It is really one of the fine houses of the city, perfectly adapted for entertaining, with immense, spacious rooms which command a noble outlook over the bay. Miss Belle McKenna, who has most artistic taste, assisted Mrs. Martin in supervising the details of the decoration and furnishing, and as no expense has been spared the general effect is superb. If it is not too daring, I venture to hope that Mrs. Martin will give a grand housewarming and ball at which society will have an opportunity of inspecting the new residence.

Quite an interesting engagement recently announced is that of Miss Sadie Samuels, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. D. Samuels of the Lace House, and Mr. J. S. Foorman, son of the well-known capitalist, Simon Foorman. Miss Samuels is an exceedingly sweet, pretty and accomplished girl, who has devoted considerable of her time to charitable work. Mr. Foorman is a competent business man, and derives a large income from his interests in Tuolumne mines and in the Campo Seco canal.

Mrs. J. M. Cunningham has returned from New York and is living at her home on Pacific Avenue. She has been in bad health since the death of her husband, but doubtless the congenial climate of California will restore to her the vigorous health she has usually enjoyed.

The H. Wangenheims celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of their marriage at their temporary home in Sausalito. A large gathering of relatives and friends assisted in honoring the occasion, and I am told that some of the ladies exhumed the gowns they had worn at the Wangenheim wedding years ago. It is not every woman who can keep her gowns twenty-five Winters.

Mr. and Mrs. McCutcheon are building a pretty cottage near the Clarke Crocker villa on Pacific Avenue. It is a species of bungalow, and undoubtedly will be furnished with good taste. Mr. and Mrs. Ed. Schmiedel are living in a pretty villa on Baker street.

The second paper chase of the season saw an excellent turnout last Saturday at San Rafael, and the Hunt Club is to be congratulated on its efforts to provide sport. The previous winning hounds, Miss Gertrude McFarlane and Mr. Hugh Hume, were hares, and the following riders started in pursuit at about 3:30 p. m., after allowing twenty minutes start. The run was timed as having occupied about 1 hour and 20 minutes, the hounds making up eight minutes on the handicap. A small boy, A. H. Curtis, on a bareback steed, who was said to have cut the course, showed up first and received a special prize, but Miss Ema Hunt amongst the ladies, and Mr. A. H. Boardman were the legitimate prize-takers. Miss Warburton and Miss Bella Davidson secured honors also, and among others who rode were Miss Crowley, Dr. G. F. Shiels, F. J. Johnson, Dr. Howitt, A. Folger, M. Farnsworth, Ward McAllister, J. and G. H. Poheim. The guests of the hotel assembled at the start and many spectators collected together in carriages at the meet.

After the festivities of the Fourth the guests at the Hotel Rafael have indulged themselves in a rest. The weather has been simply glorious over at San Rafael, and the moonlight nights have served excellently the purpose of the enthusiastic bicyclers, though there has really been less riding and driving done on account of the pervading warmth. Of course, as there are a number of people at the hotel there is always something going on, and small dinners are of frequent occurrence. There are parties to the Fairfax Villa almost every night, and indeed there is no lack of entertainment and incident at this caravansary.

The event of the week was the celebration of Mr. Sam Boardman's birthday. Mr. Boardman is one of the most popular young men in society, and in honor of the occasion a surprise party was arranged for him. Most of the young people in the hotel gathered in the new summer house and enjoyed a jolly supper. The guest of honor was toasted, and was the recipient of innumerable gifts, most of which were accompanied with humorous doggerel reflecting upon Mr. Boardman's many accomplishments, and on his recent success in the paper chase on Saturday, which he won in fine style.

On Friday last Mr. Donald De V. Graham, assisted by Mr. H. J. Stewart, gave a song recital in the San Rafael Hall. Though a very beautiful, it was also a very warm night, and that doubtless prevented the gathering of as large an audience as Mr. Graham had every reason to expect. It was a thoroughly interesting concert, however, and the enthusiasm made up for the lack of numbers. Mr. Graham is an excellent vocalist, and rendered charmingly a variety of songs in English, French, German and Italian. Indeed, he was in good voice and did his talent and his reputation justice. It is to be hoped he may be persuaded to repeat the concert, as those who missed the occasion lost a treat. After the entertainment Mrs. Hager gave a supper in honor of Mr. Graham at her cottage in the Rafael grounds, which proved a very interesting affair, as all Mrs. Hager's parties are. Some twenty young people gathered around the table and everyone had a thoroughly good time.

At the Hotel Mateo this evening there will be given a ball that is expected to surpass anything before seen at that center of fashion. The local residents, summer visitors, and a large contingent from this metropolis have interested themselves in the affair, and there is promise of a gay and festive gathering, with everything done in first-class style, under the supervision of Manager Sheppard. The large dining-room and adjoining reception-room will be transformed into a ballroom for the occasion, with lavish and tasteful decorations of flowers and choice plants. An excellent orchestra from San Francisco will furnish the music, and everything is to be done to make the event as enjoyable as is possible.

Between the Endeavorers and Bryan, Oaklanders have managed to amuse themselves fairly well these latter days. I have record of a number of small affairs, yachting parties, picnics, hay rides and other festivities of a similar type, all of which provide entertainment for those most concerned. At all events it is not nearly so tiresome in Oakland as it generally succeeds in being at this time of year, and that is a big step in advance. Among the recent affairs was a yachting party on the Dolphin, chaperoned by Mrs W. E. Sharon. Besides the members of her own family, she had as guests Miss Pauline Fore, Miss Sadie Whitney and Miss Genevieve Fore, Mr. Walter Lambert, Mr. Dan Belden, Mr. Elmer Smith, Mr. Herbert Becht and Mr. Will Russell. Then there was a picnic party to Lake Chabot, chaperoned by Mrs. Seth Mann, whose guests were Miss Harris, Miss Clift and Miss Judson. Miss Elizabeth McGraw had a surprise party given to her on Saturday evening at the home of her sister, Mrs. Elizabeth Henley. There were about twenty young people present, and the evening was alternated between games and dancing. Some thirty men and maids went off with Mr. Hackett on his yacht. The trip proved thoroughly jolly, and concluded with a clambake. Mr. and Mrs. William Schwerin of Alameda had a party on Saturday evening in honor of their daughter, Miss Schwerin. The home was handsomely decorated, the garden illuminated with lanterns, and there were all the other appropriate features of out-door enjoyment. At Berkeley it is very quiet. Miss Lombardi entertained a number of young people at her home recently, but otherwise there has been but little going on.

Miss Jones of Sacramento is the guest of Senator Eli Denison, and several entertainments have been given in her honor. Miss May Tucker and Miss Bernice McDonald are guests of Mrs. Baxter at Santa Barbara.

Drama, Comic Opera and Vaudeville in Town.

Heaviest melodrama and lightest, frothiest comedy have been served together as the piece de resistence of the Baldwin menu this week. "The Wife of Wiloughby," a romance in one act, as the author calls it, and the "Late Mr. Castello" (so late in fact that he does not come at all), make a fairly good double bill, though the comedy is, of course, by far the most successful. The idea of "The Wife of Wiloughby" appeared some year or so ago in "Town Topics" in short story form, and many of the "Topics" readers long remembered it as a strong and pungent tale leading swiftly to a capitally original climax. It was better as a story than as a play, or perhaps one should say it was better as "a" story than as "the" play. In the play the culminating situation (Isabel's avowal of her guilt under the assumed anger of her husband) can be foreseen from the very start, so that when at last it comes it has none of the element of surprise, which in the more cleverly constructed story was it main charm and strongest point. Morgan, so it seemed to us, missed his chance for admirable acting in this scene—the scene where he learns for the first time of his wife's infidelity. His back is turned toward the audience as he receives the news, a business—it cannot be unintentional—which is only allowable in actors such as Irving and Jefferson, who know how to make a pose as effective as a speech, and an attitude as powerful as a violent gesture; who can throw expression into their shoulders and suggest grief in their back hair. Mr. Morgan is far from this as yet. Besides this, his Wiloughby grasps the complication far too readily and quickly. The strangeness, the incredibleness of the situation should have been at first and for a long time his strongest and most predominant sensation.

Maud Odell's Lady Isabel was less open to criticism. Miss Odell is one of the most painstaking and conscientious actresses now before the public, and at the same time one of the most ambitious; besides this, she is young and at the very threshold of her career. With such a combination elle trait loin. Without doubt tragedy seems to be her forte just now, but one rather suspects that this is merely a transient phase. There was a certain exuberance about Miss Odell's Isabel that is perhaps to be at once regretted and excused. The value of restraint and the tremendous importance of suggestion are the very last things that an actor or an actress learns. Some never learn it. Those that do are spoken of by their last names ten years after they are dead or retired, which is another way of hailing them as geniuses. Miss Odell does not overact. There is not the slightest suggestion of rant about her; exuberance is, perhaps, after all, the best word. Miss Odell merely emphasizes too strongly and exaggerates too generously the emotions of her assumed character. Her acting is truthfulness, but truthfulness pushed to the very verge of improbability. She goes in the right direction, only she goes a little too far.

Miss Mannering was more successful as Sadie, in "The Late Mr. Castello," than in any other role in which she has thus far appeared. In her witty fencing with Captain Trefusis (Hackett) she was the clever, ingenious, artful young widow from curtain to curtain. The naturalness of her manner, and the unaffectedness of her spoken lines were as good as anything seen here since Rehan gave us Gucki, while her impotent rage over the return of Alvarez—even though based upon a comedy situation of the broadest character—suggested almost Shakespearean possibilities. Indeed, the women of the piece carried off all the honors. Mrs. Charles Walcott was at her very best as Mrs. Bickerdyke, and Miss Tyree in the ingenue role of Avice was particularly delicious. She made the scene where Avice almost proposes to Uniacke—does in fact kneel at the chairside—altogether charming and naive, and it would have been so easy to have given the impression of coarseness. Hackett as Captain Trefusis was only fairly good: farce comedy is not his forte and never will be. Mr. Hackett cannot unbend gracefully. The formal, the stately, and the grand manner fit him like a glove, while agitation and the flapping of coat-tails seem utterly foreign to him. In the very last tableau, where he is holding the fainting Sadie in his arms, his fervor of manner was little short of ridiculous, and quite inconsistent with the character of his role. It was fortunate for him that his lines helped him out. Mr. Hackett certainly could not have been effective otherwise.

"Christopher, Jr.," is a cleverly written comedy, full of bright, interesting lines, and in it the Frawley Company appears to advantage, almost, if not quite, to as much advantage as did John Drew and Maude Adams. In presenting Mrs. Ryley's play the Frawleys display commendable originality, and, as a result, their work may be termed a new version of a familiar piece. Frank Worthing plays the careless Christopher, and his comedy is quite acceptable, even with the memory of Drew in one's mind. It is true that one misses the byplay and sidework of Drew, but one is also thankful for the originality of the conception, for the absence of any attempt at imitation. Blanche Bates isn't Maude Adams, and she doesn't try to be, wherein there lieth another cause for rejoicing. Passable originality is infinitely more agreeable than clever imitation—not that Miss Bates' originality is merely passable; it is more than that—in fact, it is very pleasing, but it is the idea, the freshness of her conception that takes even better than its effect.

Outside of Christopher and his Matilda there is little in the play for the balance of the cast. J. M. Colville is good as Christopher, Sr., and Harry Corson Clarke makes a clever character out of the silent Mr. Glib. Eleanor Moretti has some original and effective gowns as Mrs. Glib, and Gladys Wallis is a very pretty Nelly Colt. An agreeable feature of the production is the setting of the third and last acts. It is on the trifles in a cabinet or the pictures on a wall that the fortunes of a play may depend almost as well as in the work of the players, and the sooner Mr. Frawley realizes this the sooner will his productions reach the desired perfection.

By very long odds, "The Isle of Champagne" is one of the most agreeable comic opera productions San Francisco has had for many a month, and one of the most satisfactory the Tivoli has ever given. In fact, the Tivoli has taken unto itself a lease of new life—pleasing, energetic life. It may be due to Edwin Stevens, or the new music, but to whomever it may be due, it has brought pleasure to the public and dollars to Mme. Kreling. As for the opera, its title is alluring, suggesting much it does not contain. It suggests bright sparkling music as bright and bubbling as champagne itself, and comedy as crisp as the first small bottle. Mr. Hurst's music is pretty—very pretty in parts, but there is little or no sparkle in it all. The most taking numbers are "The Imp of the Wine" and Priscilla's bird song; the opening chorus has little life in it and is altogether too long. But melody is hardly the thing in "The Isle of Champagne;" its crowning glory is its comedy—and most of this is given to his Majesty, King Mumm. As the sovereign of Champagne, Edwin Stevens has a great advantage over his work in "Wang"—there are no comparisons to make, but at the same time his action all through is very suggestive of Hopper, a sort of refined version of the lengthy De Wolf. Elvia Crox Seabrooke, as Priscilla, the New England maid, has some pretty music and sings it quite acceptably. Myra Morella has also some pleasing music, but a much prettier gown—the dainty affair of the last act with the pink roses. The two ballets are good, the second in particular—a graceful dance, set to a graceful air.

Though the new features at the Orpheum are hardly up to the excellent standard of the house, the entire performance affords ample variety and excellent amusement. Lillian Perry's song and dance turn catches the gallery, and Caron and Herbert, the comic acrobats, give occasion for plenty of merriment. The singing of Charles Whyte and Imogen Comer are well received, as also Harry Le Clair's burlesque entertainment. The Irish comedians, Perry and Burns, are not the best of their kind, and are permitted too long a run. Lew Dockstadter's inimitable drollery, embellished with much local color, continues to maintain its quality and freshness, and probably no artist in the city at the present time will be more missed when his engagement ceases. The little farce, with clever dancing, by Frey and Fields, is a spirited production decidedly worth seeing.

It is quite a clever idea that of the Johnson-Locke Mercantile Company inducing the community to patronize the Ivory & Lenox soap by virtue of tickets to the Orpheum. Provided you use a certain number of cakes of these excellent soaps you are entitled to a proportionate number of admissions. Of course, the soaps are the best of their kind, and the show is equally good in its way, and for further particulars of the scheme our readers are referred to page 14—to the announcement of the Johnson-Locke Company, where the offer is set forth at length and with complete details.

"ROWY" AND "CHAMBERS"

A scene from "Pudd'n Head Wilson," to be produced at the Columbia Monday evening

DRAMATIC NOTES

The good success of the Isle of Champagne" at the Tivoli has encouraged the management to bill the piece for next week. There will be no change in the cast, and the audience will have another chance to hear Edwin Stevens as King Mumm and Elvia Seabrooke as Priscilla. The other roles will be interpreted as heretofore.

With this evening's performance of "The Prisoner of Zenda" the Lyceum company terminates its engagement. John Drew opens the autumn and winter season of the Baldwin, and his own as well, on August 22, with "Rosemary," by Louis N. Parker, author of "The Mayflower." Miss Isabel Irving has replaced Maude Adams as Mr. Drew's leading lady.

Ouda, the world famous aerial artist, heads the list of new people at the Orpheum next week—his performance is of a most thrilling nature. Miss Ida Gray Scott, an operatic soprano of some repute, will sing some popular selections, and Mr. Frank J. Bryant, monologue artist, is to appear in a clever and amusing sketch. Mr. Lew Dockstadter has been retained for another and positively final week, also Imogene Comer, Smith and Fuller, etc.

The production of "Rosedale" at the Alcazar is announced for Monday evening, although the drawing powers of the Chinese play might continue for several weeks to come. The appearance of Francis Carlyle has awakened considerable interest, and promises as well for the performance as for the attendance. George Osbourne will play Miles McKenna, J. Harry Benrimo Colonel Cavendish May, and Hugo Toland will reappear as Matthew Leigh. Of the ladies, Adele Belgarde will play Lady Florence May, Miss Selene Johnson Rosa Leigh, and Mrs. F. M. Bates Tabitha Stork.

Mr. Theodore Hamilton has given "Pudd'nhead Wilson" very successfully in the East since the death of Frank Mayo, and his version of the character at the Columbia next week may be looked forward to with reasonable pleasure. The play itself, dramatized by Mr. Mayo from Mark Twain's well known "Century" story, is full of charm and dramatic interest, and is one of the very few plays of Southern life without some distressing allusion to the war. This ante-bellum period admits of quaint costumes and old time effects, a welcome relief, for a week at least, from modern gowndom. Miss Eleanor Moretti will appear as Roxy, her creation in the original production of the play. "The Case of Rebellious Susan" will follow "Pudd'nhead Wilson."

Next week Morosco's wil put on "The Fast Mail." The play is well known, having been immensely popular for the last three years, both in this country and in England. It is replete with dramatic interest and unusually startling mechanical effects. In one scene a freight train consisting of engine, fourteen cars and caboose, dash across the stage with all the accompanying realism of steam whistle, brakes and switches. Another scene represents a steamboat race on the Mississippi, another the familiar patrol alarm, and still another Niagara by moonlight. The cast will include the regular company, strengthened by the engagement of George E. Bebon, dialect impersonator, and the reappearance of Rosamond O'Connell and Julia Blanc, who has recently recovered from a dangerous illness.

Mr. Charles Ulrich's Chinese drama, "A Celestial Maiden," has been received in Oakland with much more favor than was anticipated. Mr. Ulrich has taken excellent advantage of the dramatic possibilities of life in the Chinese quarter, and as a result his play is interesting and effective from beginning to end. Miss Ola Humphrey as the Celestial maid Kim Soy is graceful and dramatic and has been well received. The success of "A Celestial Maiden" has been so pronounced that it will very likely be continued for another week, something almost unprecedented in Oakland. The audiences have been large and composed mainly of some of the best people of Oakland and San Francisco.

"EQUALITY"

Bellamy Brings "Looking Backward" Further Forward.

Edward Bellamy has dreamed another dream, one less poetic than his "Looking Backward," yet, marvelous to tell, a logical continuance of it; a thing quite remarkable in dreamology. "Equality" (D. Appleton & Co.), as this new book is called, tells more at length the story of the socialistic America which Mr. Bellamy with prophetic eye first looked upon about ten years ago. It is not a romance but an economic study, not a thing of art and beauty, nor of life and blood, but of facts, arguments, reasonings and debates. It is a dream because intangible, unreal, the product of a disturbed mind, and it is as reasonable as a dream, as likely to be true, as possible as some. The characters are the old ones: Julian West, the young millionaire who went to sleep in 1887 and slept a century, to find himself on waking, in a new world where "everyone is somebody and no one anybody," as Gilbert sings; Edith Leete, great-granddaughter of that other Edith to whom West was engaged when he went to sleep; Dr. Leete, father of Edith and West's guide, philosopher and friend in this strange world, where everyone has $4,000 a year and comparatively little use for that. It is a fine hope some ways, that of this Massachusetts lawyer. He seems to believe that some day it will be. The song that he sings is one of enchantment to every struggler in this world of competition, of hard blows and rough tussling for a bed, a loaf and a coat. It is quite as alluring as that which came to the ears of those confident young men who left this city some months ago to find that paradise in the South Pacific, where it was said rich and luscious maidens were eagerly awaiting them upon the coral strand; wives with dowries of lands and unstrung pearls were to be had without the asking, and life was to be one long sunny afternoon at a seaside resort. Quite as alluring and quite as false. Taking advantage of the years of hard times we have endured since "Looking Backward" was published, Mr. Bellamy makes his new work a review of our situation—the growth of trusts, industrial and land syndicates, railroad monopolies, strikes, bank failures and governmental chaos—to tell the world that all these things would not be if socialism prevailed, if we substituted national capitalism for private capitalism, national co-operation in industry for private management and control.

In this America of 2000 A. D. pictured by Mr. Bellamy every one works and no one starves, and the Government directs every one and the Government is every one, and women wear trousers, and men don't drink, and horses are no longer seen, and all clothes are made of prepared paper, and suits cost only ten or twenty cents apiece and are as beautiful as poems and are never worn but once, and the sewage is deodorized by electricity before it leaves the house, and the girls are all hypnotists, and every one has a job he likes, and the churches don't fight, and the newspapers don't publish advertisements. It is a great world to be sure, but what would Huntington and Rockefeller and Pullman and a few other such men be doing in that world of sweetness and light? Mr. Bellamy thinks that the Napoleonic spirit can be killed by giving Napoleon enough to eat and a vote at the polls.

The most captivating portion of the picture presented by Bellamy is that dealing with improvement of physical conditions, not those resulting from socialism, but those which have taken place within the hundred years, and most of these seem thoroughly reasonable, altogether quite to be expected. The hero is much surprised to find that the heroine, the fair Edith, with whom he has fallen in love, is what we would call to-day an agricultural laborer. He asks for an explanation, and is carried out to the farming district on an airship, where he looks down upon the scores of maidens performing the hardest, or what would to-day be considered the hardest kinds of farm labor. But the difficulties are all smoothed out by means of electricity. In every field are small electric stations, simply a couple of wires containing the electric power which is generated by the action of the waves of the sea a hundred or two hundred miles away. Electrical machines perform all the drudgery, being guided and directed by the hands of women as well as men. It is no more difficult to work a plow than to ride in an electric car, no more trouble to spade a garden than to run a wheelbarrow, and through rapid transit facilities being so thoroughly developed farm-workers no longer live isolated and remote from the advantages of city life; electric lines and air machines carry their passengers at a hundred miles an hour, and enable Miss Leete to live in Boston and cultivate a farm in the Berkshire Hills with no more inconvenience than if she lived in San Francisco and a ranch in Berkeley. Julian West is asked if he does not wish to attend a performance at the theater to be given in Honolulu that afternoon, and laughing at the oddity of the suggestion is taken into a room whereby the use of what Bellamy calls an electroscope he sees and hears all that takes place on the stage at Honolulu and at the very time it occurs. With the development in electrical science which has been made in the last decade, it does not seem ridiculous to expect that in less than a hundred years we would be able to enjoy the pleasures that come from this combination of the telephone and the veriscope. It is hardly fair for Mr. Bellamy, however, to claim advantages for his socialistic commonwealth which are alone due to the discoveries of natural science and the inventions of men, but without these facts the book would be a most hopelessly dreary economic treatise. These fancies, however, act as a sugar-coat to the socialistic pill.

Bellamy deals at length with the influence upon woman and her condition of his socialistic scheme. The hero notes that neither maidens nor matrons wear diamonds or gold or silver ornaments, and asking Dr. Leete for the reason, is told that when woman gave so much thought to devices for enhancing her beauty it was owing to her economic dependence on man's favor; a woman's face was then her fortune, while the reason that men are so careless as to their personal appearance was their independence of mere physical beauty. In themselves because they are no longer dependent. Bellamy's idea is that in this day, while the most of men are the servants of the rich, the woman is subject whether her husband be rich or poor; she is the servant of a servant. At the very bottom of the social heap, bearing the accumulated burden of the whole mass is woman; all the trials of the soul, mind, and body which the race endures weigh at last with cumulative force upon her.

"The failure of a man to marry may cost him happiness, but in the case of woman it not only involves loss of happiness, but as a rule exposes her to the pressure of poverty," says Bellamy. The result is one of the most shocking spectacles the world has ever seen, nothing less in fact than a state of rivalry among women for the opportunity to marry. Not only is there a constant surplus of unmarried women desirous of securing the economic support that marriage implies, but beneath these are hordes of wretched women hopeless of obtaining the support of man on honorable terms, and eager to sell themselves for a crust. While the marriage contract is to-day embellished by a rich embroidery of sentimental and religious fancies, it is, after all, only a legal undertaking by the man to support the woman in consideration of the surrendering of herself to his exclusive disposal. The only point which the social censor looks to in fixing the purity or impurity of any sexual act is as to whether the condition under which it has been performed is in accordance with legal forms. That point properly fulfilled, everything formerly regarded as wrong and impure becomes rightful and chaste. There may be persons drawn together to marry by base and sordid motives; the bride may be constrained by need to accept a man she loathes; youth may be sacrificed to decrepitude, but according to our standard if the contract has been legally executed all that follows such marriages is white and beautiful.

There are now two distinct codes in sexual matters, one for men and one for women; men refuse to be bound by the law society enforces on females by reason of this economic dependence. All these various relationships are done away with in Bellamy's new world; women, having an equal income with men, demand and receive equal consideration. Not only is the female of the twentieth century a new woman in the enjoyment of equal rights, but quite as much so in the attainment of perfection of figure. The woman of the future it appears is to be more lovely than the Venus of Milo. She is to attain a stature two inches taller than the present average of the sex—gained by the full, free and untrammeled life which economic independence will have opened to her. No more invalids then, for all women having to work a moderate amount and being able to lead their own lives will have strength and health.

One of the great problems of our day is the concentration of population in cities. The city is fast devouring the country. But this process will be stopped if Mr. Bellamy has anything to say, by the simple process of abolishing the need of markets. The national organization for production and distribution will perform all the functions of exchange now rendered by private capitalists. The produce of the country will no longer be handled and distributed by the cities except so far as produced and consumed there. The provision of employment and maintenance on equal terms to all will take away the advantages of localities as aids to livelihood, and there will no longer be any motive to lead a person to prefer a city to a country life.

As to the political system which will rule a hundred years hence, Bellamy is prophetic. He makes Dr. Leete say that in this new America power is never delegated irrevocably, but is always subject to recall. Public officials are liable to have their powers revoked at any moment by the vote of their principals. Any measure passed by a representative body must be referred back to the people. Thevote of any delegate upon any important measure cannot stand until his constituents have had an opportunity to cancel it. There is no bribery because the credits which the people have are untransferable. There are one hundred or more elections every year, and all manner of questions, from the temperature of the public baths or the plan to be selected for a public building to the greatest question of what they call World Union, or what we would call international policy, are passed upon by vote. But we regret to say that our great grandchildren will dine in the middle of the day and will be vegetarians, if Bellamy is an accurate predicter.

Mr. Bellamy has evidently attempted in this book to answer the various objections and criticisms that have been made on his "Looking Backward." His work cannot rank with that of Lasalle or Marx, for he is not scientific in his mode of dealing with economic questions. He is evidently a gentleman of kind heart, and he labors sincerely, but ignorantly, with the question of how the lot of all can be made more happy. It is my recollection, however, that when "Looking Backward" came out and proved tremendous in sales, Bellamy confessed that he had not expected to become the father of a movement by his book, his ambition being along the line of fictionist rather than economist. Sucess has proved to him, however, that he may get a following and win both fame and fortune. "Equality" is not a good book to give into the hands of those untrained in the consideration of social and economic problems. The author has ignored the weak points of his scheme and emphasized the strong ones—but in so doing he has been unfair and unscientific. He is able to show the injustice of the present conditions, and he promises a better time under socialism as glibly as does Mr. Bryan under silver, but with no more reason to support it. His dream is not a new one. Three hundred years ago More dreamed one equally good. He evidently is unable to see that his hope cannot be anything more until man's nature has been changed, and it takes tens of centuries, not tens of years, to modify even so little as a human prejudice. Bellamy is adroit, not deep, forceful, not convincing. "Equality" is neither a novel nor an economic study, and it will fall far short in popularity of "Looking Backward." T. P.

MISS TYREE TALKS

Frohman's Pretty Actress Expresses Her Views.

An actress that didn't want to be interviewed! Now, just think of that. And yet that's what Miss Tyree said.

"Not that I find it a bore," she said, as we sat down in the only two chairs the Endeavorers had left vacant.

"What then?"

"Only that my opinions are not important enough."

Miss Tyree is very pretty, and some men have found a pretty woman's opinions to be—under some circumstances—the most important things in the world. I wish I'd thought to say this, but I didn't. I made a deprecating mumble instead. Miss Tyree was good enough to assume it had coherency, and remarked:

MISS BESSIE TYREE

"I have a conscientious objection to interviews"—I reached for my hat—"but I guess you can stay and talk."

We began on dramatic tendencies. It's a safe foundation to begin on.

"The public are getting tired of serious plays. Pinero, Jones, Grundy and those men. Somehow they're not so popular as they used to be."

"What's the trouble," said I.

"Oh, the public must be amused. It's a great big child playing with blocks. It doesn't even want letters on the blocks. A play that strikes some seriously and stirs them up a bit—they don't want it. They want comedy every time."

"They don't want to pay attention too closely?"

"That's it. I suppose many of them are business men who come to the theater with their brains tired enough anyhow. It's hard enough to get their attention at the best, and hard enough to hold it when you've got it. But San Francisco is a first rate theater town—better even than New York."

"For instance."

"Well, this hat ordinance. You'd never have got New Yorkers to take their hats off. Just think of having the right now to make a lady take her hat off. But there is, oh, there is one thing I wish they wouldn't do."

"What's that? They're pretty bad about some things."

"No, about most things they are pretty good."

"What?"

"Just so soon, in the last act, as a San Francisco audience sees all the actors begin to assemble for the closing tableau—just so soon as they see that, you'll begin to hear them stir and reach for their hats and things."

"That's very true. I'm afraid I've done it myself."

"You are very bad."

"I am that."

"And rude."

"I'm afraid so."

"Why do you do it?"

"Oh, I—because—well, the others do."

"Fancy now!—as if that was a reason. Do you have to catch a boat? Do you live in Oak—"

"Miss Tyree!"

"I beg your pardon. Well, then, why do you do it?"

"The seats at the Drinkand—" I began, feebly.

"Oh, pshaw, but I know. San Francisco people, the men, I mean, must eat and drink right away after the play's over."

"I never—"

"Some of them don't wait even for that."

"I go to listen to the music," I protested, stoutly.

"Why not stay and listen to the play. You've paid a dollar and a half for that."

"That's very true."

"Do you know we often have to cut and rearrange the last act just on that account, for fear the people will start to go at the wrong time."

"I never knew that."

"But it's really very rude for the audience to act that way, and after we've tried so hard to please them all through an evening."

"Of course you're right."

"You wouldn't do it in a parlor, would you, at a musicale, say?"

"Well, naturally—"

"Look here! Suppose a chum of yours was telling you a good story, and thought you were listening, and all of a sudden you would turn your back and walk away."

"Oh, come now, it's not the same thing."

"We actors feel just as bad as your chum would."

"But are we worse in San Francisco?" I asked.

"'M-hum, much, otherwise you're fine, but you do get up before the piece is over, and its really dreadful of you."

"But those tables at the Drinkand—" I began again.

"As though that made a difference."

"Well, I won't do it again."

"Pooh, of course you will."

"No. I promise. It is as you say, very rude and discouraging."

"And annoying to the nice people who really want to listen."

"That's so. Well, I promise."

"And say so in your interview?"

"But this was to be an interview on 'tendencies' 'and—and—all that."

"Bother your tendencies. Will you say so in your interview?"

"I—I guess so."

"Promise me."

"That's an old song.'

"But will you say it?"

"All right, I will, like this: It is very rude and unkind and ungenerous for an audience to get up and leave the theater—or start to do so."

"Or start to do so before the very end of the piece. You'll write it just like that?"

"I will."

And I hope I have. F. N.

There was a ring at the bell. She applied her ear to the instrument and asked sweetly: "What number, please?"

"Give me No. 474."

"I am sorry that No. 474 is engaged now," she replied. "You can have No. 473 or No. 475 if you wish."

TURF TOPICS

Racing and Breeding Notes — American and English Celebrities.

California horses have made but little show on Eastern tracks so far this season. The Burns & Waterhouse string, the two-year-olds of which especially promised so well, seems to have had a good deal of ill-luck in the way of health. Of the older division belonging to other owners, Ruinart, Howard S., and Scarborough have all to prove their quality yet in the East. The first-named is reported to be in fine fettle, and has already won the good opinion of the Eastern critics in his work. Mr. E. J. Baldwin's stable went away from Santa Anita only lately, and has yet to settle down to business.

The California-bred horse Ostler Joe seems to be meeting with all the success in Montana that was predicted for him in these columns. It seems almost a pity that he was not given an opportunity of distinguishing himself in Eastern fields.

Eastern turfmen seem to be satisfied that Ornament, the winner of the Latonia, St. Louis and Oakley Derbies, is the best three-year-old on this continent, and anyone venturing to question this estimate would hardly be considered in his right senses. His last victory in the Oakley event called for considerable effort, but it was evident that the colt was a good deal off, owing to his previous exertions and the effects of traveling. He will probably put in an appearance for the Buckeye Stakes to-day, and is also expected to start for the International Derby at Detroit on August 10th. He seems to be able to hold his own at any distance, being possessed of speed, staying powers and courage, even when giving weight away to all of his competitors upon tracks in all conditions of going. He is described as standing about 16 hands and weighing, say, 1,100 pounds; in color a rich chestnut, with blaze on face and near hind leg white half way to the hock, bloodlike in appearance, true in proportions and a beautiful mover in all his paces. It is to be hoped that Mr. Haggin may be fortunate enough to breed from his parents, now at Ranch del Paso, another of the same sort to bring glory to California.

One of the best horses that has figured on the English turf of recent years is Victor Wild, who has just gone into retirement. Foaled in 1890 by Albert Victor, a son of Marsyas out of a Stockwell mare, dam Wild Huntress by Remorse, a son of Macaroni out of Rio by Plum Pudding, a son of Sweatmeat, he was not a fashionable thoroughbred according to present ideas, but his ability to take a crushing weight to the front over courses of three-quarters of a mile to one mile in length, has proved amazing. He seemed to have a particular liking for the Jubilee Course (one mile) at Kempton Park, having in two succesive years, 1895 and 1896, won the Great Jubilee Stakes, on the last occasion carrying 133 pounds, and having also there landed the Coronation Cup—his final essay as a racehorse—on June 26th last with 139 pounds in clever fashion, giving from 37 to 48 pounds to other speedy animals. His performances in the Royal Hunt Cup (7 furlongs—166 yards) at Ascot, winning once as a four-year-old with 105 pounds, and running second twice subsequently, the first time with 132 pounds and the second with 138 pounds, and giving lumps of weight away to horses of good class, will always be memorable. Since being purchased in a selling race when a two-year-old by his present owner, Mr. T. Worton, he has earned for him somewhere in the neighborhood of $250,000, and will now go to the stud, and, if all goes well, produce a handsome annual income. In his last race he was ridden by Momy Cannon, and the return to the paddock was the occasion of one of the most tremendous ovations ever given to any horse in England, where "old Victor" had become a public idol. In the betting Mr. P. Lorillard's smart three-year-old gelding Sandia, a prominent winner this season across the water, divided the honors of favoritism with Victor Wild, the former having slightly the call, but the old horse gave the American representative 42 pounds and finished three lengths in front of him, the five-year-old Chasseur landing second, a couple of lengths in advance of Sandia.

The thoroughbred yearling sales in New York have shown rather better results on the whole since the month opened. Mr. W. H. Forbes' select consignment of youngsters by imp. Meddler brought an average of $1,027, the colt out of imp. Ononia, by Hampton, being taken by Mr. J. A. Keene at $4,100.

One of the problems troubling breeders of thoroughbreds is how to dispose of the surplus stock that owners of racing stables decline to bid for at the annual sales. In the present condition of the market, unless a youngster can be sold for racing purposes as a yearling, it is valueless. At the same time anything possessed of substance and good looks should by proper management be made to cover the cost of raising, even if no profit can be obtained. The French government are reported to have made extensive purchases in Kentucky, Virginia and Tennessee this spring of thoroughbreds suitable for cavalry mounts, and it only requires a little satisfactory experience on the part of buyer and seller respectively for further developments in this direction. There is not the same prejudice in Europe against thoroughbreds for useful service that there is in this country, and, in fact, blood is essential in the harness and saddle horse, though it must not be obtained at the sacrifice of power and weight—carrying capacity; with those two essentials in the make-up the more blood the better. Very high prices can be obtained for thoroughbreds that promise to be suitable for hunters, chargers, and ordinary saddle and harness horses. If breeders will give attention to substance, as well as speed, the foreign buyers will be glad to take three and four-year-olds that were not saleable as yearlings, and pay remunerative prices for them. In the United States there is probably a better demand now for high-class saddle horses of thoroughbred type than there ever has been, and this feature is certain to develop, as no one who has once regularly ridden a horse of the kind ever wants to own anything without such quality. The thing to do therefore is to cease breeding weeds as far as possible and keep the yearlings that are unsalable for the race course until they can be turned to account for useful purposes.

All reports encourage hopes of a good harness racing season on the local circuit, thanks to the efforts of the Pacific Coast Trotting Horse Breeders' Association to maintain the standard of the meetings, notwithstanding the withdrawal of the State appropriation from the district fairs. At Los Angeles there is a promise of an excellent meeting in the fall.

The State Board of Trade has published this month a valuable book dealing with the resources of California, its history and products. Amongst a series of interesting papers included therein is one by Mr. Charles M. Chase, President of the State Agricultural Society, on the "Live Stock Interests of California." In dealing with horses Mr. Chase states that the statistics of his society show that in the last twelve months there has been a reduction of ten per cent. in the number of horses in the State, and a more than corresponding increase of values, which even now on Mr. Chase's showing are perilously near zero. Really good horses for useful purposes are very hard to find, and no special effort seems to be making to remedy this state of things. The conditions of the market are a serious impediment to breeding enterprise,

An "illustrated review" under the title of "Racing in California," edited by Ben Benjamin, the well-known local turf writer, and published by the Racing Publishing Company, 313 Bush street, San Francisco, will be of interest to all horse-lovers. Several of the principal illustrations have appeared from time to time in the pages of the "Wave," and from its issues some have been reproduced in leading Eastern journals. The articles on "California Horses in the East," by Ralph H. Tozer, and "Pioneer Racing in California," by Captain Thomas B. Merry, are both of historical value, and bring out most strikingly the merits of California as a horse country. The data supplied by Captain Merry should form part of every American horseman's library.

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

The late Dr. von Stephan, the German Postmaster-General, recently took a train from Konigsberg to enjoy a few days' deer-stalking. Arrived at Dirschau, he stepped into the station telegraph office to send news of his safety to his wife in Berlin. The official recognized his chief at once, and with all obsequiousness began to write down his message. Suddenly the Morst instrument, used for service-telegrams only, began to work, and very shortly his excellency pricked up his ears, for he distinguished the particular clicks that represent his own name. A glance at the clerk's face, now deathly pale, induced him to inquire further into the purport of this State telegram, and, when the clicking had ceased, he took up the paper ribbon and read as follows: "Look out for squalls. Stephan is somewhere on the line. He will be poking his nose everywhere." The Postmaster-General smiled sardonically, and then went to the transmitter and flashed back this reply: "Too late! He has already poked his nose in here—Stephan."

An amusing clerical yarn is told by S. K. Hocking in "The Temple Bar." Dr. D., an eminent clergyman, had preached a special sermon, and had scarcely got into the vestry when in rushed a well-dressed and rather good-looking man, who greeted him effusively. "Delighted to see you, doctor," he said. "You have given us a grand sermon. It has been a treat—a real inspiration to us all." The doctor smiled, and expressed his gratification, and the man left the vestry. But no sooner had the door closed than one of the deacons looked up from the "Notice Book," and said, "You must not take any notice of him, doctor—he's got softening of the brain."

A party of Stanford professors undertook, for a scientific object, to penetrate into the depths of an old Tuolumne mine. One of the number relates the following startling incident. On his ascent in the ordinary manner, by means of a bucket, and with a miner for a fellow-passenger, he perceived, as he thought, unmistakable symptoms of weak places in the rope. "How often do you change your ropes, my good man?" he inquired, when about half-way from the bottom of the awful abyss. "We change them every three months, sir," replied the man in the bucket; "and we shall change this one to-morrow if we get up safe to-day, sir."

Munro Fraser, one of the Inspectors of Schools for Scotland, tells a story of a Highlander who was out for a walk with his wife one day, and had the ill-luck to fall into the water. After great difficulty he managed to scramble out again, and was assisted up the bank by his wife, who had been almost distracted. "Ah, Donald, dear," she said, "you ought to be ferry thankful to Heaven for your life being spared!" "Ay, ay!" he replied. "Profitence was ferry kind, but I wass ferry clever, too!"

Mahony, the Irish wit, known as "Father Prout," once called on a literary lady, whom he found conversing with a gentleman whose manners indicated his familiarity with good society, but whose apparel betrayed his slovenliness.

"Did you not notice his well-bred ease and courtly tone?" asked the lady of Mahony, after the gentleman had left the room.

"Yes," growled, the cynical wit, "your friend can well afford to put some polish in his manner, for he keeps none for his boots."

An eminent Oxford man was invited to dine with Jowett, Master of Balliol, at the Lodge. The butler, who helped him to take off his coat, sighed deeply. "I am sorry to hear that!" said the guest. "I hope you have no cause for anxiety at home?" "No, sir—it's nothing," answered the butler; "only the master invited twelve to dine this evening, sir, and you are the eighteenth who has come."

On one occasion Mrs. Julia Ward Howe presented herself at a club of which she was a member with her bonnet wrong side front. After some hesitation, lest Mrs. Howe should feel hurt, a sister member informed her of the mistake. "What a blow to my vanity!" said Mrs. Howe, with an amused smile. "I thought I was receiving quite an unusual amount of attention as I came down town in the car, but attributed it solely to my own attractions!"

An ancient sage, who lived when it was common to erect statues to obscure persons, being condoled with that no such honor had been conferred upon him, replied with wit, but also with satire: "I prefer to hear it asked why I have no statue, rather than why I had one."

IN THE EVENT OF WAR.

The projected annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States has progressed no farther than to a favorable report from the Senate Committee, to which the pending treaty for annexation was referred. The Senate has displayed no disposition to accept the recommendation of the committee, or to act on the treaty at all during the present session of Congress. The present probability is that when the tariff bill is passed the Senate will adjourn to the time of the regular session in December, leaving the annexation treaty no nearer to consummation than it has been since it was formally signed in the State Department a month ago. In the interval which, as it now seems, must elapse before the ratification of the treaty can be finally considered, every influence hostile to its confirmation will be actively at work to defeat it, and every danger to which we are exposed by such unnecessary and unreasonable delay in the final disposition of an affair of such grave importance to ourselves will become more acute. Among these dangers must be reckoned the chance of war, however remote it may seem at present.

The protest formally made by the Japanese Government against the treaty still stands. It will be remembered that this protest rests substantially on three points: first, that a continuation of the present status of the Hawaiian Islands is essential to the maintenance of a proper understanding—meaning, probably, of friendly relations—among the powers bordering on the Pacific ocean; second, that the treaty, as drawn, makes no provision for the future maintenance of the rights which the Japanese now enjoy under the present treaty relations between Japan and the Hawaiian Republic; and, third, that no provision is made by the proposed treaty for satisfying the claims, preferred by Japan against the present government of the islands, for damages incurred by Japanese subjects in violation of their rights under existing treaties. With the justice or sufficiency of the points so raised we are not at present concerned. Secretary Sherman has answered the Japanese protest in a rather perfunctory fashion, with the customary assurances of friendly regard, but it may be taken for granted that the answer is not such as will induce the Japanese Government to withdraw its protest or to abandon any design which it may have formed of preventing, if possible, the accomplishment of the projected annexation. In this age of the world governments bent on war look for plausible pretexts rather than for justifiable motives for their actions; and if the Mikado's statesmen really contemplate disputing by force our right to incorporate the Hawaiian Islands within the territory of our Republic, on our own terms, they can easily find pretexts in sufficient number in the points which they have formally put forth by way of protest against the treaty of annexation. Such pretexts may perfectly well serve their purpose while their real motives and intentions are carefully concealed or even politely disavowed.

However small may be the probability of a war with the Japanese, it may be interesting to consider the probable course of such a conflict if it should be forced on us. It must be forced on us if it comes, because the publication of the terms of the treaty has placed us in the position of exercising a virtual protectorate over the islands, and thereby thrown upon the Japanese the onus of making a declaration of hostilities if they shall conclude that their interests require such action. We Americans are generally so impressed with our great numbers, our prodigious strength and our endless resources that we have almost persuaded ourselves that no such power as Japan will ever have the temerity to force upon us an armed contest, and we believe, almost unanimously, that the only possible result of such a conflict would be the complete discomfiture of our assailants. We have a comfortable way of forgetting that we are habitually unprepared for war, and that we have always had to suffer for our lack of preparation at the beginning of every war in which we have been engaged. In 1814, when there were eight millions of us, our national capital was taken and burned by an expeditionary force of only 3,500 men. We have learned no lesson from the contemplation of that incident, and in the earlier stages of a war with Japan we would probably have to endure serious disappointment and humiliation. The opening act of such a war would unquestionably be the seizure by the Japanese of the cause of controversy, the Hawaiian group. Such a seizure is perfectly feasible, for the Japanese have a stronger naval force available in the Pacific than we have; they have ample transportation for an expeditionary force sufficient to the task in their merchant marine, and they have an army vastly more numerous than any force we could dispatch against them and far superior in efficiency to any troops that we could organize outside of our little regular army. Three or four strong brigades of infantry once landed on the islands, with a proportionate train of artillery, supported by a fleet strong enough to command the sea for a time sufficient to allow the material for fortifications and submarine mines to be brought and placed in position, could so strengthen their hold that it would be a task of some difficulty and doubtfulness to dislodge them. Yet we are powerless to prevent such an occupation of the islands, if the Japanese see fit to attempt it. We have available for service in Pacific waters one battleship, two coast defense vessels, three good cruisers, and not a single torpedo-boat. This entire force, if it could be concentrated, would be insufficient to encounter the Japanese fleet with any sure prospect of success in preventing a hostile occupation of the islands, and we have no land force to send with it for that purpose. But our fleet, even such as it is, could not safely be concentrated for such a purpose. To do so would be to strip the Pacific Coast of its only defense, and the Japanese generals and admirals showed, in their brief and successful war with China, that they are not to be relied on to neglect such an opportunity for taking the offensive as our naked coast would furnish them. They may even think that they see in us another China, huge, rich, and helpless. In the matter of the defense of our coast we are, in fact, much worse off than China was at the time of the Japanese invasion. In the seventeen degrees of latitude through which our Western coast extends we have not a single modern gun or mortar in position, except at San Francisco; and if we are to believe the Commanding General of our army, the guns and mortars that we have are in the wrong place, and what he has officially pointed out as the site for the Gibraltar of the Pacific coast is as yet destitute of armament. The same military authority has detached our gunners from their guns and sent them to unfortified places for reasons which, if they have come to the notice of the Japanese generals—as, doubtless, they have—will hardly tend to increase their respect for our military leaders or their terror of our defensive preparations. Aside from San Francisco the entire coast is open to any raid that may be undertaken by anything from a fleet to a single cruiser. To this consideration San Francisco may, in the event of war, owe its immunity from attack. The prizes to be had elsewhere are greater in the aggregate and are to be had with no great risk or trouble. The coast cities of the south can be held to ransom by a cruiser on the high sea. The bar of the Columbia river, once no mean defence for the cities of Astoria and Portland, has been removed at great expense to facilitate navigation, but no defensive substitute has been provided. The great inland waterways of Puget Sound are as free and open to an enemy as to a friend, and Seattle, Tacoma and Port Townsend are the prey of any naval spoiler who may covet them. Seattle, to be sure, is to have an army post and a regiment of infantry at Magnolia Bluff, but this military arrangement, in perfect accord with the prevailing Chinese tone of our military administration, has no relation to the defense of the Sound, but is dictated solely by considerations affecting the value of real estate in that vicinity. The Sound cannot be defended from Seattle any more than San Francisco could be defended from Stockton or Benicia.

Enough has been said to indicate that there is reason for our belief that we should have anything but plain sailing in the event of war. Let us take what comfort we can from the belief that war will not come this time, and dilute it by the reflection that whenever it shall come it will find us, in all probability, quite as helpless and unprepared as we are now.

ANOTHER MUNICIPAL MUDDLE.

The Mayor, the City Attorney and the Council of the city of Oakland have managed to involve that city in a legal problem, the solution of which is a matter of lively interest to every municipality in the State. Up to November last our State Constitution provided that cities and towns, and their several charters, should be subject to and controlled by general laws. At the November election there was submitted to the people of the State an amendment of the Constitution, in what was supposed to be the interest of municipal home rule, by which the "municipal affairs" of cities and towns were excepted from the operation of such general laws, and this amendment was ratified by the voters. Nevertheless, the Legislature, at its recent session, proceeded to enact general laws affecting municipalities throughout the State, and, necessarily, affecting their "municipal affairs." One such Act of the Legislature required that all ordinances passed by the legislative body of any municipality which affected the appropriation of public moneys, the granting of public franchises or the determination of gas and water rates, should be submitted to the Mayor of the municipality for his approval or disapproval. The City Council of Oakland requested the City Attorney to furnish an opinion as to the applicability of this Act of the Legislature to the proceedings of the Council, and the City Attorney in his reply held that the charter of the city of Oakland prevailed against the general law in any matter affecting the municipal affairs of the city, and that the acts of the City Council were not controlled by the law in question. The law certainly related to a very important "municipal affair"—the manner in which the legislative power of the municipality should be exercised in certain very important cases—and the power to exercise control over such affairs had been taken from the Legislature by the constitutional amendment. If the City Attorney's opinion was correct, it meant that no general legislation affecting municipalities could be valid, because any such legislation must almost inevitably affect "municipal affairs."

Soon another complication arose. It became necessary for the city of Oakland to refund certain bonded indebtedness of the city, and in the absence of any provision in the city charter for the authority to effect and the method of effecting such an operation, it was necessary to look for authority in the general laws of the State concerning municipal indebtedness. Such a law, general in its nature, had been enacted by the last Legislature, which prescribed in minute detail the duties of the City Council and the various municipal officers in connection with the process of refunding. In accordance with the provisions of this law the City Council passed an ordinance providing for the desired refunding of the debt. Thereupon the Mayor of Oakland requested the opinion of the City Attorney as to the validity of such an ordinance. The funding of the city's debt seemed to the Mayor to be quite as purely a "municipal affair" as the passage of a city ordinance affecting water rates; and if the Legislature had been deprived of all power to control the Council in one affair, it must be equally powerless to confer any power to proceed in the other. If the general law passed by the last Legislature was invalid, then the bonds to be issued by the city of Oakland under the authority of its provisions would be illegal, and the credit of the city would be impaired. However desirable it might seem to the members of the City Council, and to the City Attorney, that their legislative acts should be exempt from review by the Mayor, it was not desirable that the operation of refunding the debt of the city should be stopped for lack of legal authority. So the City Attorney promptly furnished the Mayor with an opinion that the general law on the subject of refunding does apply to the city of Oakland, from which it follows that the refunding ordinance passed by the Council is valid. The City Attorney bases his opinion on the fact that the city charter is silent on the subject of refunding, and says that in such a case a general law of the State applies. But there is no exception in the constitutional provision by which the Legislature is deprived of control over municipal affairs. There is no mere subordination of a legislative right to control in municipal affairs to the right conferred on a municipality by its charter. The prohibition is, in terms, an entire exclusion of the Legislature from control of municipal matters. When the validity of legislative acts concerning cities and towns is attacked, the question that arises is not whether such Acts concern municipal concerns for which the municipal charters have not made provision, but simply "Does the Act relate to municipal affairs?" It is clear that the City Attorney of Oakland has involved himself in two inconsistent opinions, and that the city of Oakland has become involved in a muddle from which the courts alone can extricate it. It should be remembered that our theory of municipal government proceeds on the assumption that all municipalities are the creations of the State from which they derive all their powers. The Legislature is the organ of the State's sovereignty, from which such powers are granted and by which they are limited and defined, subject only to the Constitution. It seems now that by resorting to a constitutional amendment for protection against possible encroachments by the Legislature we have deprived ourselves of the only source of relief in emergencies in which our city charters may prove to be defective. It may be that the Supreme Court will find a way for us out of the present dilemma, but it is more probable that we shall have to resort to another amendment of the Constitution for relief.

DEFICIENT CONSULAR REPORTS.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the Consular service of the United States has hitherto failed to maintain its standing as compared with the same services in other countries, so far as regards information furnished respecting the commercial situation and progress of the localities within their respective jurisdiction. The frequent representations on this point that are being made by the press and the commercial community of this country have produced some improvement during more recent years, but the shortcoming is still serious, and the cause of perpetual annoyance to those interested.

The general character of the work that is done is perfunctory. It seldom extends beyond brief periodical reports on foreign manufactures and the import and export trade of certain ports. Such a thing as dealing with articles of produce is rarely thought of apparently, unless it be to touch upon some more or less exceptional product, such as a particular kind of fibre, for instance, which has provoked inquiry from some quarter of the United States that may have been thought suited to its cultivation. All the time, however, growers of staples like cotton, grain, hops, and other great standbys of our agriculture are left by our Government hopelessly in ignorance of the doings of their competitors in other lands. It is quite possible that the instructions to Consuls may not cover this ground, and that consequently the Secretary of Agriculture is not in a position to benefit his constituency by furnishing the information which could be derived from their advices on such subjects; but, if this be the case, there should surely be some better system devised.

In other countries, Germany more particularly, provision is made for helping agriculturists in this respect, with the result that the producers are to a great extent as well posted on the conditions which are likely to affect markets as are dealers and shippers themselves. As a matter of fact the necessities of the American growers are greater in this respect than those of their competitors, for this is a country of vast distances, and the producer is not within personal reach of his market in the way that the grower in older and more thickly settled countries is, with dealers and agents competing at his very door. The farmer here is, therefore, entitled to every bit of useful information that his Government can procure for him, and he has a right to expect that the Secretary of Agriculture in particular will take his interests into his care in every way he can. In the direction to which we refer there is manifest neglect, and possibly if the attention of the Federal Government were given to the matter this could easily be remedied.

There is a steadily growing conviction that California is within sight of really prosperous times again. Many go so far as to herald a boom, but this condition of exaltation being always attended by a disastrously long swing of the pendulum on the reverse side later on, the best friends of the State would wish to see the benefits that are said to be coming to our citizens rendered permanent by the causes that can at present be distinctly seen at work. The mining interest has always been of supreme importance, and hardly a day passes but what some satisfactory account comes to hand of developments on existing properties and embarkations on fresh enterprises. The use of electricity in mining work has become a powerful factor for good, and large undertakings are being conveniently handled with its aid. The quartz crushing era has hardly begun yet in California, and it is the universal opinion, not by any means new, but thoroughly established, of all well-informed mining men that greater wealth is in store for the mine operator than has ever yet been found. In the grain market the level of prices is very much higher than has been known for years, with prospect of continuance or even advancement in the future. Although there is always a large speculative force at work in the market here and abroad, the actual trading situation contains much assurance for the farmer who, with December and May wheat selling in the neighborhood of $1.42 per cental in the local market and "foreigners taking everything in sight," as reported from the East, can experience a sensation to which he has long been a stranger. In fruit circles the general outlook is more cheerful from every point of view. Crops are on the whole good, the foreign trade is in vastly improved condition as to prices and inquiry, while the winemakers are now getting returns that leave them good profits on their investments. Livestock is also on the upward grade,and so with almost every commodity, save, perhaps, the small hop product, in the commercial list. All this means a vastly increased revenue for producers, and a consequent enhancement of values throughout the State to give confidence to the capitalist, the immigrant, and those who have borne and are bearing the burden and heat of the day. The development in the Northwest will not be without its reflection on this metropolis of the Pacific Coast, and our people may be depended upon to share in its benefits, as indeed they have done already to a considerable extent.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

Quite the most important personality in Central America to-day is Reyna Barrios, who so recently appointed himself Dictator of Guatemala. Of course one does not attain that degree of power even in a Latin-American republic unless possessed of uncommon capacity, and in the accomplishment of the scheme it is inevitable that a little history bemade. Some months ago there was an election in prospect in the Guatemalan republic, and for the Presidential chair there were four active and influential candidates. They were rather too energetic to suit Barrios, who was determined to succeed himself, and announced his own candidacy with equal enthusiasm. They have been making laws in that region for many a moon, and one of the aspirants discovered a statute which expressly provided that no President shall be eligible for a second term. This barred Barrios, and the other candidates were happy. Not for long, however. Barrios discovered an equally ancient statute which compelled any citizen to serve in the army if so ordered by the President, and made it high treason to refuse. He at once drafted his four rivals into the army and sent the regiment to which he had attached them into the interior, many miles from Guatemala City. A month after the little man had proclaimed himself Dictator the quartet of aspiring successors were told what had happened. The historian, however, has failed to describe their expressions when the situation was fully revealed to them.

There need be no doubt about the importance of Barrios. He is the most ambitious man in America. No longer may he be spoken about as "coming"—he has arrived. He has something of the stature of Napoleon and is an ardent admirer of the little Corsican; posseses all the histories and memoirs that relate to the Emperor's deeds, and is as ready to fight as to administer. This heritage of his uncle's aspirations (Barrios I.) has descended to him, and now he bids fair, by diplomacy, to achieve all that this relative had set out to conquer. A recent telegram told us that Guatemala had joined the new confederation of Central American States. The constitution agreed upon provides that the man who is the first President shall serve but one year and shall not be eligible for re-election, but is empowered to name his sucessor. An eminent San Salvador statesman, who had the backing of Barrios, was elected to rule the new republic, and the story goes that he has evinced a desire to have the Dictator of Guatemala take the seat when he vacates it. This means that Barrios will be supreme in Central America for twelve years, for that is the Presidential term. He may remain also Governor of the State of Guatemala, a position that will unite both profit and power. Barrios has done wonders in his own environment, as I have before stated. With such a fine endowment of administrative ability he is liable to make a compact government of the new confederation, which would then prove a potent factor in Continental affairs. Unlike Diaz, he has been at great pains to win the favor of the Church, which is his staunchest upholder. His uncle banished bishops and priests from the land. Barrios has had them all back and reinstated them in their old authority. He is all the more effective in his ambitions because he has both subtlety and determination and will carry a project through at any cost. It is this type of man that makes nations.

That an influential local corporation like the Alaska Commercial Company should find itself in a position to help forward the developments in the Northwest, and to secure benefits for the business interests of this city, as well as itself, is a matter for much congratulation. When the company ceased to exploit the sealing trade of the Alaskan waters it turned its attention to developing that region upon a general trading basis, and by energetic and judicious management has succeeded in placing itself in a position that any competitors who may now enter the same field will find it hard to assail. The navigation of the Yukon river for well-nigh 2,000 miles is a task by no means easy, and can only be effected by flat-bottomed steamers of very light draft. To carry fuel for the voyage is out of the question, and the only provision possible in that respect is the establishment of wood depots, no coal being obtainable, at regular intervals along the route. These reserves of fuel have been systematically collected by the Alaskan Commercial Company, whereby they are enabled to-day to maintain a regular service of steamers, which has become an important factor in assisting the colonization and trade development of the region within their influence. To say that this was done with a view of existing mining developments is to assume Messrs. Sloss, Gerstle & Niebaum gifted with prophetic powers. They doubtless foresaw important trade developments and now reap a splendid harvest for their enterprise. The Alaska Commercial holds the same position towards the new country that Cecil Rhodes and his associates held towards the Transvaal, and thus profits will be enormous. Already they have made hundreds of thousands of dollars and the great rush will net them millions.

The wish being father to the thought that the great strikes in the Northwest might be found to have been made on ground belonging to this United States, a suggestion was soon thrown out that the Canadian Government were trespassing there. A little enlightenment from responsible persons has served to show that this has not been the case, and by all accounts it is well for the pioneers, who have so courageously faced all difficulties, that they were not left to be a law unto themselves, as would have been the case pretty much had they been rushing on to American ground. From the returned adventurers lately landed here, and from all reports coming in from the Yukon district, nothing but grateful praise is forthcoming for the Canadian system, which has provided competent official control at the mines. When disputes, at all times unavoidable under the conditions prevailing during a rush, have arisen, the surveyor on the spot has given immediate attention to their adjustment, and on his report of the position of affairs reaching the Canadian Government a Commissioner was forthwith appointed to the locality, with absolute power to carry on the civil government, collect revenue, issue licenses and administer justice by deputy or otherwise. From his decisions there is no appeal, except to the Supreme Court of the Dominion, whose policy in all such matters is as far as possible to uphold the local authority. The latter is at the same time instructed to avoid all technicalities, as far as possible, in rendering his decisions where mining matters are concerned, and to treat questions from an equitable and common sense point of view. The feeling that is said to prevail with ninety-nine American miners out of every hundred in the Northwest Territory is one of thankfulness that they are amenable to the mining laws of British Columbia.

Not only for the professional miner and seasoned prospector, the hardened veteran of blanket-roll and pick, does the Klondyke hold forth its barren and questionable charms. The fever, this new kind of "yellow" fever, has smitten the men of San Francisco like any plague, sparing neither high nor low, rich nor poor. The question now heard on all sides is, "Are you going?" and among those who can return, an affirmative answer, are some of the best known and finely-bred young men of Pacific Avenue and the Western Addition—young fellows whose fathers knew the difference between a pay streak and a blind lead, and who have the fever bred into their blood. The latest additions to the ranks of the younger generation are Duke Baxter, Laurie Adams and G. H. Whitney of tennis fame, who go north on the Excelsior on the 28th to try their luck. These young men set their faces toward the Pole with full realization of all the hardships to be undergone before the El Dorado is attained, but the game is worth the candle, and who can say how much "dust" they will bring with them on their return to God's country.

Just within the last three days of this week the real, genuine gold fever has appeared in this city, or reappeared, one should say. It is a relapse, as it were. We had it once, this gold fever, some fifty years ago, and of late we had thought we were quite cured of it. But the germs, the bacili, still remain, and at the first contact with the old familiar dust, lo! the old disease, the old craving and thirst and fever is back again, spreading like an epidemic, like a plague, as strong and resistless as ever. It was very like the "Examiner" to organize the expedition to the new diggings, and quite consistent with the tremendous enterprise and activity of Mr. Hearst's "Monarch." One may smile sometimes at the "Examiner's" colored supplement and Sunday "scareheads," but at the same time it is as active and vigorous a news collector as can be found between the oceans. The "expedition" is to go by the river route, and will probably be the last large party to get in this season. The energy displayed by the management can be appreciated by the fact that Mr. Hamilton and his party will be obliged to take their own couriers (probably natives) with them, sending them back with their stuff at different points along the route. The regular mail comes out but twice a year, and though it is understood a contract has been drawn up providing for a monthly mail service, it is extremely doubtful if this will always be able to "get through." The "Examiner Expedition" will, however, be independent of this system.

Far from the madding crowd, and from the pernicious, demoralizing effects of the gold fever, the Bohemian Club is quietly spending the week under the sombre redwoods on the Russian River. It is all one to the Bohemians, these days, whether fortunes are lost or gained on the Yukon, whether gold or gravel is found along the Klondyke. The return of the successful miners staggering under their weight of dust and nuggets is only mildly interesting to them so long as the afternoons are long and the nights serene. There has been a veritable "rush" of Bohemians to the "diggings" on the Russian River this week. Never before in the history of the club have so many of its members availed themselves of this golden opportunity for a week's outing. The camp is full already and overflowing, and to-day (Saturday) will witness the last influx of tardy ones, who arrive just in time for the great midsummer Jinks, High, Low—and otherwise. The Low Jinks promise to be especially entertaining this year. Charles Dickman has put on the finishing touches to his ballet, and H. J. Stewart has labored nightly to make the High Jinks (of which he is the Sire) one of the most memorable of all. By the way, the "ballet" is to be tout un affaire. It is given out that for over two weeks it has been under almost daily rehearsal at the Tivoli, under the supervision and direction of professional ballet masters.

As was quite confidently expected and predicted by everybody not interested in the "wild-eyed" scheme, the South Pacific Colony, which left here on the Percy Edwards last winter, has totally and miserably collapsed. The company has split up into a dozen or more cliques, all jealous of each other and all pulling in opposite directions. Instead of going on to the Solomon islands, "the Eden of the Pacific," the Percy Edwards has headed for Auckland, New Zealand, with about sixty men. There are seventeen left on the Fiji islands, while some twenty-three set sail for Serva (some hundred miles from the last-named group), in a small sloop.. But the skipper of the sloop piled her up on a reef near Levuika, where the men lost everything but their bare lives. The funny part of the business is that a British man-of-war, The Lizard, was obliged to accompany the Percy Edwards down to New Zealand for fear of a mutiny on board. The seventeen men who deserted the ship at the Fijis would, it was supposed, start in at once collecting bananas, and an arrangement was made with the owner of a stern-wheel steamer plying down to New Zealand to bring up a certain cargo of plows, horses, etc. It would appear, however, from letters received in this city that the enervating influence of the tropical climate has already begun to tell upon the colonists. Some of them don't care a rap about growing bananas, and the stern-wheeler has never been heard of. The colonists hold that it is much pleasanter to consume than to produce. When they are not chewing sugar-cane, they are boating in a Fiji canoe and generally enjoying themselves. They describe the climate as warm—about 80 degrees—with a shower of rain about once a day.

ANOTHER CHINESE DRAMA

Highbinders and Kidnapped Maidens on the Boards in Oakland.

Mr. Charles Ulrich of Oakland has "seen" Mr. Francis Powers of San Francisco and "raised" him a bean or two. His play, "The Celestial Maiden," at the Oakland Theater, seems to have "caught on" with no little degree of tenacity. A big audience welcomed the first pertormance and the piece has been playing to the capacity of the house ever since. Whether the Chinese drama has come to stay is yet a matter of speculation. One is inclined to suppose that the novelty of costume and setting is the great attraction, and that when this wears off the Chinese drama will have to be judged upon its merits, just as the ordinary play. Ulrich's "Celestial Maiden" has for locality, of course, San Francisco's Chinatown, and the three principle scenes—the street scene, the joss house and the interior of the opium den—are true enough to life, though not so carefully staged as was the Alcazar play. The actual Chinese who act as supers will probably be a feature now of every Chinese drama that is billed. Mr. Ulrich's Orientals were admirable, and go through their parts with quite as much intelligence as their white brethren.

It is rather strange that the successful stories and dramas composed thus far that deal with the life in Chinatown have had to do with kidnaping. Chester Bailey Fernald began with "The Cat and the Cherub," Powers followed with the spiriting away of Chan Toy, and Mr. Ulrich has swung into line in making his story revolve about the stealing of his "Celestial Maiden," Kim Loy. There is a certain Romeo and Juliet element in Mr. Ulrich's play. He makes use of a love affair between young people whose families are at feud to evolve an interest in his characters, the feud in this case being the chronic mutual hatred of Sam Yups and See Yup.

Li Ching is a prominent and wealthy Chinaman, a member of the San Yups, and in fact one of the officials of that organization. He has for a friend a certain Chon Yet, of whom he first wins the confidence, and afterward the betrothed Li Ching owns a slave girl named Ah Mee, however, who, in consequence of brutal treatment, betrays the fact of the kidnaping of a fortune teller, Lee Toy, who finds means to communicate the news to Chon Yet. Chon Yet stirs up the Sam Yups against the false friend; Li Ching is assassinated, Kim Loy is rescued, restored to her lover and all ends well.

The humorous element of the play is supposed to be furnished by the Irish policeman, who, nevertheless, is not always successful in sending the audience into gales of merriment. The wedding party is a rather picturesque affair, while quite the best scene of all is that of the joss house, where the Orientals are depicted throwing the prayer sticks and burning incense to the great porcelain and gilt gods. The play is to be continued another week.

THE CITY HALL ROTUNDA

Color Effects in California Marbles — The Height of the Dome.

A very pleasing effect has been contrived for the rotunda of the City Hall dome by the architects and designer (Frank T. Shea). The style of the rotunda—in harmony with the rest of the building—is in the Italian rennaisance style, the only difference being in the choice of materials used. Some of the interiors in other portions of the City Hall are lamentably bare. The rotunda, however, gives an admirable impression of richness and color. Everything in the rotunda, marbles, flooring, tiling, copper molding and the like is of California production. The copper indeed was not mined in this State, but the design for the capitals of the pillars, where copper was used, was executed here. The marble that has been used in the rotunda is one of the most notable features of the design. The twelve-foot wainscotting on the ground floor is of what is called Mono county travertine, and is the very best marble from the quarries of Mono county; the marble in the second gallery is of a beautiful shade of green, and is again the first marble taken from its particular quarry—the Rimball quarry of San Diego. The marble in the third gallery is from Inyo county, while that employed in the pavement and staircase is from Amador. All the ornamentations, the capitals of the pillars, the trimmings, fittings, hand rails, etc., are of copper, laid in hammered sheets or heavily electroplated upon iron.

It is a pity that the general effect of the interior is marred by the incorrect spacing of the columns. This peculiarity of the rotunda has naturally enough brought about a good deal of criticism. The distance between the pillars seems to have been left almost, as one might say, to chance. In some cases the distance is fifteen feet, in others nine and in others ten. This blunder, however, must be laid upon the conscience of one of the former architects, and, indeed, this arrangement of columns was a serious drawback and disadvantage against which Mr. Frank T. Shea was obliged to contend. Nor was it the only one. The same firm were the architects for the dome itself. The height of the dome called for 355 feet from the curb to the top of the torch, and, according to the "law of domes," the diameter of "the lower order," or rim upon which the dome rests, should be of equal dimensions. In the City Hall, however, this was not the case, and it was found impossible to construct a 300-foot foundation for the dome. Mr. Shea was therefore compelled to construct a "lower dome," whose height would greatly exceed its breadth.

It is not universally known that the present dome, or more technically speaking, "tower-dome" of the City Hall is one of the highest domes in the world; it is thirty feet higher than the dome of the Capitol at Washington, and only shorter than that of St. Paul's, London, by the same distance.

COLONEL CROCKER'S OBSEQUIES. CONVEYING THE CASKET INTO THE CHURCH

THE LATE C. F. CROCKER

Able in Business, Openhanded in the Interest of Science and Charity.

There is one less notable man in California since last Saturday night, one less big-hearted gentleman. Charles F. Crocker was one of the few millionaires of the State who was really popular outside the circle of his intimate friends, and it will be long before the death of one of San Francisco's business men will be so universally lamented as his was.

Charles Frederick Crocker was a native of Sacramento, being born in that city on the day after Christmas, 1854. He was educated in that city until the age of sixteen, at which time he entered the California Military Academy, remaining there until he was nineteen years of age. At twenty Mr. Crocker went abroad and spent a year or so traveling in the old country, after which he returned to America and entered the Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn, N. Y. It was only a failing of eyesight and general ill-health that prevented him from graduating thence with distinction; as it was, however, he was obliged to forego a college career and enter upon one of business. Mr. Crocker accordingly returned to California and identified himself with his father's financial and railroad interests. He served a thorough apprenticeship, went through the operating department, acquired a knowledge of traffic affairs, and in due course was called on to take his father's place in the executive department of the company. He served first as Second Vice-President, and was subsequently elected First Vice-President—a position of tremendous importance and power. It is very easy to say that Charles F. Crocker owed his advancement to the fact that he was his father's son. But it must be borne in mind that besides his father there were to be consulted the other gentlemen who controlled the interests of the great railroad, and among whom were some of the shrewdest and most discerning financiers in the country. Had Mr. Crocker shown himself incapable or unsuited for the honor placed within his reach, these gentlemen would have soon found means to impede his advancement. So one may assume that Mr. Crocker fairly earned his promotion.

THE MATERNITY COTTAGE; A PROTEGE OF THE CROCKER ESTATE

Personally Fred Crocker, as he was familiarly known, was the most approachable of men, and his manner invariably tended to put the visitor at his ease. There was no ostentation about him, no offensive swagger, no disagreeable assumption of dignity and importance. One of the richest men west of the Mississippi, he was at the same time one of the most companionable. Let us hasten to add one of the most charitable as well. It has been estimated that his estate gave away yearly to charitable institutions something over $30,000. He was, however, as methodical in this as he was in his business, and even employed an agent whose duty it was to investigate the validity of the thousand and one claims made upon him. Mr. Crocker was particularly interested in astronomical observations, and made several splendid gifts to the Lick Observatory, including one of the most valuable astronomical cameras in America. He was also a Regent of the State University, and though a man of multifarious interests was perhaps the most regular in his attendance at meetings of any of the board. It may be said also that he cared much for pictures, having possessed himself of some splendid canvases by eminent artists, including several of Keith's finest landscapes.

Beyond these exterior expressions of his character Mr. Crocker was a most generous host and loved to entertain, and he entertained. He gave the best dinners in town, and his cellar contained clarets beyond price. He was a most devoted father, and in all respects of life tried hard to do what was right. Indeed, it may be truly said that he was a very good man, and his death is a subject for real regret. The pictures that accompany this sketch show two of the charitable institutions with which the Crocker family is identified.

In the July Forum Frances M. Abbott, writing on the "Social Standard in America," remarks: "We are now taught not to eat with our knives; though any well-bred old lady will tell you that that was the custom fifty years ago." Evidently another case of history being the reverse of the truth or is the breeding of the "any old lady" not quite up to the mark?" There are people in the world who can trace their family back for twenty centuries and are still eating with their fingers, but they would not be quoted as examples of refined society and the manners and habits belonging to it for many long years before the present century. The writer of the article would seem to need much enlightenment on other subjects also, for she says: "It is possible—in some places—to get as appetizing a meal on the Pacific as on the Atlantic coast." We who know both coasts and live on the former by choice would say: "Yes, only more so."

HEARD ON THE BOULEVARDS

Gossip and Personalities From the French Capital.

Of things theatrically interesting to Americans, the most important that has happened in Paris this week is Yvette Guilbert's return from the States, and the expression of her opinions as to Americans in general. We Americans may possibly be in doubt as to Lord Salisbury's attitude toward us, or we may not be quite sure of the good will of Ambassador De Lome, but we know now precisely, exactly and unequivocally just what Yvette thinks to the ninth part of a hair. Yvette loathes and hates and abhors and detests and abominates Americans. There is nothing too bad that she cannot say of us. In her remarks upon the subject she attains a height of tragic oratory that is not far short of downright sublimity. She is eloquent, impassioned, intense. She is almost—but I say almost—clever. This little explosion of rage, this miniature eruption, was started in an interview sought by an unhappy corespondent of the New York "Journal." According to Yvette's story she was induced to write an introduction to a book about her life, which she was stupid enough not to have read first. When the book appeared it was not to her liking. Oh, not at all to her liking. So she went forthwith straight into heroics, or hysterics, whichever you prefer. "Never! Never! Never!" says Yvette, will she return to America, where they have dared! dared! dared!! compare her to Anna Held, and where the managers called her songs shocking because thereby they thought to fill the houses.

It is just barely possible, however, thatYvette's career is on the wane; that her bolt has been shot, and her song sung. Sarcey, the actor-maker, has turned his back upon her, finds her no longer entertaining, rather the contrary, a little faded, a little passee, a little dull.

THE CROCKER OLD LADIES' HOME

One cannot afford to be a little passee as regards the public Parisian; one must be like an egg, absolutely and irreproachably fresh, or—

By the way, Alan Dale has had a very funny interview with Cleo de Merode. He came over from New York to talk to her, expecting to see her name in every kiosk and in every newspaper. There was nothing of the sort, however; no one talked of Cleo, and her name was nowhere to be seen. True, she went on in "l'Etoile" at the opera, but excited no comment. Later on Alan Dale hunted her up—actually had to hunt for her—and after all sorts of amusing mishaps with one of those French elevators which you are supposed to run yourself was landed in Cleo's apartments. He describes them as co.. and in execrable taste. Cleo talked with him for half an hour and left him in a state of abject surprise. She insisted that she was an intensely proper, serious-minded young woman—fancy Cleo—and that dancing with her was merely business; that she never, never went anywhere without her mamma, no indeed, and that the interpretation of the classic dance was all she cared for. Then just as Mr. Dale was beginning to be genuinely alarmed at the eerieness of the situation a discreet cough from the adjoining room afforded him the solution of the matter. Mamma Merode was there. When Cleo heard this cough, what do you think she did? She looked at Mr. Alan Dale of New York and winked an eye. This situation was saved.

Meilhac is dead, the author of "Frou-Frou" is dead. He had rallied from his last attack, and at a time seemed in a fair way to recover; did, in fact, recover, and then relapsed suddenly, fatally, till he could no longer remember anything. One mot is accredited to this Meilhac, one mot while breathing away his life upon his deathbed. Just before the end he pulled together a bit; said (to Granderoux, his collaborator): "Do you know, I can recall my name again?" "But nobody forgot it," answers Granderoux. "Yes, yes, I did," says Meilhac, "and that is quite enough." So he dies. Almost at the same moment Rejane is wringing salvos of applause out of her London audience with her rendering of "Frou-Frou."

Ambassador Porter is doing himself (and incidentally we other Americans) very proud in this city of Paris. He is very popular, "is cheered on the streets—by Frenchmen even—entertains with great ceremony, is seen at functions, launchings, corner-stone layings, openings, and the like." Last week he unfurled "Old Glory" over the new rooms of the American Art Students' Association, in the impasse Conti. The new rooms are a vast improvement over the old quarters, on the Montparnasse Boulevard; two floors of a large building are occupied, with baths, dining-rooms, reading-rooms, reception-rooms, etc. "All the modern conveniences," in a word. American art students will 'now have decent headquarters when they arrive in Paris, a point de depart, a base of operations, and in this can boast an advantage over all the other foreign students.

On Independence Day—as the American colony elect to call the Fourth of July—Ambassador Porter and Mrs. Porter kept open house to all their compatriots at that time in Paris. It was supposed some ten or eleven hundred people would be present. Two thousand descended upon the house. Mr. Porter was equal to the occasion, however. The overflow was received upon the lawns and in the gardens, while hasty orders to caterers met the unexpected demands for "lunch." Not one of the two thousand carried away with him the impression that he was not fully expected or provided for. At the Grand Hotel the same evening Mr. Porter again distinguished himself by a speech or two of more than usual eloquence quite surprising the table by his departure from the cold formal and guarded diplomacy that ordinarily marks and mars such utterances. Our own dear Chauncey was there, too, and, of course, maintained his reputation, not to say fame, as an after-dinner talker.

Henri d'Orleans is expected back from Abyssinia soon, where he has been imperially entertained by Menelik; has been given orders and gold wreaths and the like, and has obtained the Grand Cordon of the Abyssinian order for the Prince de Jainville. One fancies that the Italians are not so well pleased over the heartiness of this reception as are the French.

William Waldorf Astor paid Paderewski somewhere in the region of $5,000 for playing at a reception recently.

THE OPINIONS OF LEANDER

'Holdeth Forth Upon Our Boys and the Ways of Them.

I was villifying the head waiter in The Drinkand the other night, just after the play, because he would not let me sit in the main room where the orchestra plays, when Leander came up.

"Come on, Just," said he; "you know they won't let you sit in here unless you are with ladies."

"We wouldn't permit a lady to sit in here unless she was with a gentleman, sir," interposed the autocrat.

"The danger," said I, "is due, I should suppose, to the mingling of the sexes, not to their separation—divided we stand, united we fall. You will, perhaps, recall the fable of Æsop, of the two jars floating in a cistern—Haec Fabula docet that——"

The autocrat wavered at this point.

"I observe," said I, pressing home, "a vacant table near the door with two places——"

"Well, you know," protested the autocrat, feebly, "it's against all regulation."

We sat down.

Leander began to bow to people he knew who were sitting at near-by tables. The place glittered with electricity and silverware. There was a staccato note of conversation in the air. The orchestra sobbed away at La Paloma.

"Perfect! Perfect!" murmured Leander under his breath.

"Theatre?" I asked, and looked at his clothes.

"No—call."

"What! in a brown tweed suit, tan shoes, and a blue shirt with a white collar?"

"Thanks for the collar. Yes, I have been making a call."

"In a sack suit? Good Lord!"

"Remember this is San Francisco—1897!"

"True! true! But the suit is not even black, nor the shoes—really, Leander."

"I know her rather well."

"Still——"

"My boy (I am Leander's senior by six years) you come from a place near Brooklyn, called New York, where everybody must conform to a certain mould in clothes as well as ideas. We in the freer West avons change tout cela. Out here a man does not always have to appear in evening dress after six, nor even wear a high hat of a Sunday afternoon, unless he wants to."

We ordered our drinks. Leander, I think, had an oyster cocktail. After a moment's reflection he looked about the place, and exclaimed, nodding his head:

"For the young man with a small salary, who lives at home, San Francisco is the best place in the world."

"Or the worst," I observed.

"Huh!" exclaimed Leander, "there's something in that. But it charms you."

"So does a snake," I added, sepulchrally, "only to bite and poison you afterward."

"I say! I say!" exclaimed Leander, looking at me in some alarm; "what's up—been bitten?"

"Not yet—only charmed."

"Say, Just," exclaimed Leander, "last week we said something about the girls out here. How about 'Our Boys?' We—I mean you and I, and all the rest of us—are we desirable—are we very particularly fine?"

"We are," said I, "what our English cousins would call a jolly rum lot."

"Perhaps not quite as bad as that. But we're not very nice."

"Let's see—how aren't we nice?"

"We lack purpose, aim, ambition. We are content with little things—little glasses of liqueur, for instance" (this significantly. I was drinking a creme de menthe myself). "We do not rise to the dignity of champagne, or even to the height of straight Bourbon. Life," began Leander, rhetorically, "life in this city of ours is like a little glasslet of liqueur—pungent, sweet, heady, but without foundation, without stability—an appetizer that creates only small desires, easily gratified, and we are content with those. We are like this, we men—you and I and the rest of the fellows—at our best."

"Heavens! What must we be at our worst?"

"At our worst," said Leander, severely, "we get drunk and come to dances that way."

"Come, now——"

"Hoh! My dear fellow, it's a common sight."

"A fellow under the influence——"

"No, drunk—I choose to call it drunk."

"At a dance?"

"Worse—dancing."

"With a girl?"

"Whom, perhaps, you know and admire."

"Why not punch his head on the spot?"

"Bad form, head-punching, at a function."

"But not drunkenness?"

Leander shrugged.

"Who are they—what class do they trot in, in Heaven's name?"

"Ours. Many of them are college chaps in their junior and senior year."

"Little fools."

"Hear! Hear! and some even among the older men; but it's mostly the younger boys. Now, when these boys grow up and begin to associate with the kind of girl we were talking about last week—the kind of girl who smokes a cigarette on the sly and drinks a cocktail—then——"

"Leander, spare me the picture! After us the deluge."

"There's one of them now. Look at the third table."

"The slender chap with the pinkish eyelids and the impossible tie?"

"Sure! I know him—he's a Junior at Berkeley. That's his fifth pousse cafe."

"Little beast."

"He's drunk already, and I saw him just like that on a yachting party last Thursday, when there were a lot of nice girls along."

"Faugh!"

"And everybody knew it, and the girls—some of them—said, 'Oh, well, you know it's only little Jack Spratt.'"

"And yet we would call that a gentleman out here."

"As Doctor Pow Len says in Mr. Powers' admirable little play, 'such is the lamentable fact.'"

"A gentleman, that."

"In New York we would tell him his carriage was ready."

"Here he's received and called good form."

"I say, Leander, who is that broad-shouldered chap behind him, sitting with his back towards us? He's got a good pair of shoulders on him, and I don't think his tailor is responsible for 'em, either."

"Rather well put up, to be sure. Oh, I say, Just, look what he's ordered."

"Well, I declare! Tea and toast and a little fruit! Now, imagine a chap asking for tea and toast and a little fruit in The Drinkand! What a jay! Say, Leander, I think he must be a Christian Endeavorer who's blown into the wrong place."

"I've seen that chap somewhere, though," said Leander, perplexedly; "wonder where it could have been?"

"Hoh! Tea and toast and a little fruit! What a dead farmer—and—there! he's just declined to smoke. Poor little dear—if his mamma could only see him now! Bet he's got a C. E. badge on as long as your arm."

"Where in snakes," muttered Leander, "have I seen those shoulders and that head? 'Wish he'd turn around."

"There—he's getting up."

The tea and toast chap turned about, and we saw his face. Leander uttered an exclamation:

"It's Spider Kelly, the prize-fighter."

"Nonsense! Would he take tea and toast?—he——"

"Training, y' know. Fights Lon Agnew next week. Ten rounds, with a decision."

"Leander—let's take a walk. I'll pay for the drinks."

"You'd better."

There was a long silence after this, then Leander said:

"Anyhow, I've more respect just at this moment for the Spider than I have for the little college chap."

"At least he has a purpose, even if he is not 'good form,'" I murmured.

And with that we went away.

The Gold Diggings of the Yukon — Fabulous Finds of the Pioneers.

Every journal in the country has been teeming, within the last few days, with accounts of rich finds of gold in Alaska, and while the argosies are actually arriving at Pacific Coast ports with vast treasure, one is filled with wonder that the secrets of the Yukon river district have been so well kept. Indeed, if the columns of the daily papers be any evidence, one would almost be inclined to think there had been a conspiracy in existence to mislead everyone on the subject. That hardship in the way of travel, climate, and living, would have to be encountered by the prospector was patent enough, though that the chances of finding gold were but slender, as so often urged, was a statement or opinion that has proved utterly worthless. The color existed in the frozen Northwest, it was admitted, but only to an extent that did not seem sufficient reward for the toil and trouble it took to win.

But what are the facts?

Towards the end of August last a discovery was made 678 miles from Juneau, in a creek emptying into the Clondyke river (a tributary of the Yukon), and some twenty days later this discovery was followed by another, the two finds leading to a systematic prospecting of the ground, the soil of which, when mined, had to be thawed by fires before being available for washing. On November 23d one digger got $65.30 to the pan, and the men on the spot then began to realize that fortunes were within their grasp. The news reached Circle City, 300 miles further down the Yukon river, and was at first generally mistrusted. However, reports of still larger finds following quickly thereafter, some 300 persons, including a few women, lost no time in setting out from Circle City in midwinter to the new El Dorado. This was accomplished without any loss of life by the aid of snowshoes and dog-sledges — the usual travelers' requisites in those regions. Since their arrival the results of the winter and spring digging and washing operations have been little short of fabulous, though vouched for, chapter and verse, by unimpeachable testimony and proven in the most practical way by the arrival of the yellow metal here and at Seattle to the extent of $1,500,000, while it is estimated that before winter has thoroughly set in a much larger amount will have been recovered in addition from the Clondyke district.

It is needless to say that this astonishing success has been followed by intense excitement at all the chief points on this Coast, and a great rush has already begun to the land of promise. There are at present two alternative routes — one by coast steamer 2500 miles to the Alaskan seaport, St. Michaels, thence by river steamer 1900 miles to Dawson City, as the new centre of the Clondyke district is called (this route closing when the winter once sets in) — the other by coast steamer to Juneau and thence 678 miles across country to the same destination, the trip being performed to some extent on foot, but for the most part in canoes, with which travelers provide themselves. The difficult part of this journey lies in the mountain pass of Chilkoot, where the snowstorms are very severe, and it is greatly to be feared that many of those who are unwise to take that route later in the year may suffer severely, even if they escape complete annihilation by the elements. This route is, however, the only way in and out during the winter season, and is at all times the least expensive way of getting into the country. Once Dawson City has been reached, life will be found comparatively comfortable. The temperature during the long winter is, of course, bordering on the Arctic, while the short summer (two months or so only in length), is pleasant, though hot, and often as much as 80 degrees in the shade. The population numbers about 5000 already, and regular communication with the outside world is afforded by mail once a month.

The Clondyke district is situated from 35 to 100 miles within the line claimed as the Canadian boundary, and miners and others who have returned lately to this Coast report that perfect order is maintained by the Northwest mounted police, the commanding officer acting as the civil authority. Building lots are said to be in demand at from $5000 to $10,000, and though laborers can obtain $15 a day, no man should go there with less than $500 to $1000 for his support and return, if necessary. Actual digging can be done throughout the year, but washing is only possible when the weather is open and water running.

In British Columbia a prospector can, with confidence, go out into the hills and stake out a claim which he can hold against the world, so long as he has staked it properly and has his mining license. He must do $100 work on his claim every year for five years, and by that time he will have thoroughly proved whether it is of any value, and whether it is worth while going to the expense of having it surveyed and getting his patent from the Government, for which he pays $5.

The geographical position of the Clondyke river is 76.10 north latitude, 138.50 west longitude, at the point of junction with the Yukon, and the tributary creeks emptying into the Clondyke, and on which the present diggings are situated, are two miles or so above the Yukon. About fifteen feet of dirt is found above bedrock, and the pay-streak averages from four to six feet. The ground already prospected and located can be worked out in a few years, but there is a large territory still available, and there seems to be no reason to doubt that there will be scope for many thousands of miners for some time to come. Each claim consists of 500 feet along the bed of the river. The Indians in the district are found useful as guides and to pack loads.

Many of the personal stories told by the returned prospectors are almost too wonderful to relate, but the conviction is forced upon one that these placer diggings are to be numbered amongst the richest spots to be found on earth. It is positively asserted that $100 to $200 a pan has been a common return, while $500 and even $800 a pan has been got, and as much as $1200 a day taken out by one man. It is therefore not surprising to hear that there are men, whose names are furnished and who are known, that made $100,000 last winter by working themselves and leasing claims on shares.

Amongst other reports regarding the country, it is said that there are good indications of copper in the same district. It is to be specially noted that the Clondyke district has all been practically taken up, so far as original claims are concerned, and anyone going there now to work on his own account would therefore be forced to lease his ground. The general impression seems to be, however, that as prospecting proceeds on other streams, there will be good chances for anyone who is willing to endure the privations which the search for gold in new countries invariably requires a man to undergo. The excitement has apparently only begun to set in, and, coming upon us as it has done, after the pretty general disbelief in the gold-bearing qualities of Alaskan soil, we may now expect to see a furore that will be far-reaching in its effects, for adventurers from all parts of the world will hasten to the Northwest in quest of the fortunes to be had for the digging. At this time of year the wisdom of departing for Alaska is, to say the least, doubtful, and at all events anyone thinking of making the venture should not lose sight of the fact that so far we have only been hearing of the successes, and of none of the disappointments.

Rock formation on Bonanza Creek

The future of Cecil Rhodes is a matter that is of considerable political interest. It is now nearly four months since he returned to Cape Town, and he has recently taken his departure for Mashonaland, where he proposes to make his home for some time to come. The conclusions of the London investigation committee finding him chiefly to blame for the raid of Dr. Jameson will probably not greatly disturb Mr. Rhodes, and, however the position may be regarded, there can be no question that he will continue to exert a potent influence in South Africa. The Dutch and English in Cape Colony are mindful that to him they owe the acquisition of Bechuanaland and the opening up and development of trade in regions north of the Transvaal, the Boer Republic itself being practically closed to the trading operations of the colonists. That Mr. Rhodes did not abandon the colony after the failure of the raid, but has shown himself determined to face the difficulties of the task before him, has won the admiration of even his opponents; and, although the Afrikander Bund and the moderate English party are hostile in their attitude towards him in political matters, a man of his immense wealth and force of character, whatever its defects, who stays on the ground, instead of making a vulgar display of his riches in Europe, after the manner of the ordinary African millionaire, will in the end secure a position of the greatest power. That this is still his aim there is little doubt, but how he may use it is at present by no means clear, nor can the lines of his policy in the past be altogether taken to indicate his course of action in the future.

A Canadian lady thus recounts what she styles a modern dog-story: One morning my sister went to see a friend, who lived a mile or so from our house, taking with her our little brown cocker-spaniel. When she left she quite forgot the dog, and as soon as our friends discovered him, they did all they could to make him leave, but with no avail. Some hours passed and he was still there, so they telephoned to let us know his whereabouts. "Bring him to the telephone," said my sister. One of the boys held him, while another put the trumpet to the dog's ear. Then my sister whistled, and called, "Come home at once, Paddy." Immediately he wriggled out of the boy's arms, rushed at the door, barking to get out, and shortly afterwards arrived home panting.

The big steam yacht Valhalla, which has been chartered by the Count de Castellane from Joseph Laycock, the London banker, is one of the largest private yachts in the world, and has the appearance of a trans-atlantic liner or a man-of-war. It takes $150,000 annually to keep the Valhalla afloat and a crew of 128 men and boys. The Castellanes will sail about the world, visiting China, Japan, Spain, Russia and other countries, with a view of obtaining decorative art treasures for the new Castellane mansion in Paris. While on their travels the Count and Countess will participate in the gayeties of the cities they visit, and it is even probable that they may even bring the Valhalla as far as Newport before the end of the summer.

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

At the Tavern of Castle Craigs each day brings its measure of amusement, for where a number of guests are gathered together one may be reasonably assured of gaiety and incident. Among those summering at the caravansary are several enterprising spirits, and to their efforts may be credited the comedies, cake walks, and other entertainments that have served to pass these latter days so pleasantly. While a superb moon made the recent nights heavenly, riding and driving parties were much indulged in, and others of the guests on these evenings hobnobbed with the cliff dwellers of the picturesque Crags.

The festivities ushered in with the Fourth at Tallac House have continued unabated, and the continuous stream of incoming guests vouches for Tahoe's popularity this season. The magnificent balmy nights of the region have made moonlight cruising on the lake a favorite pastime, and with the first shades of evening a seat on the steamer is eagerly sought. The event of the week, however, was the mock trial of Oscar Polk, an episode which caused much merriment. Mrs. Valentine Hush and her sons, of Fruitvale, arrived at Tallac on Wednesday, and among the established guests are Mr. and Mrs. Downey Harvey and daughters.

The situation of Deer Park Inn is probably a potent factor in the charm it has for lovers of mountain scenery, and at present the Inn is crowded to its utmost capacity. Among the guests there are a goodly number of young people, but still the restful atmosphere rather modifies all amusement. Angling is indulged in by those who desire piscatorial triumphs, as trout abounds in the neighboring streams. Mr. T. I. Bergin and Miss Kate Mihan, together with Judge Van R. Patterson and family, are established at the Inn, and a party comprising Mrs. J. M. Lilienthal and Mrs. Louis Gerstle are among the cottagers. Mr. and Mrs. Horace Hilt and Miss Donaldson are also on the list of other sojourners.

The weather at Del Monte lately has been magnificent, which is most fortunate, considering the shoals of visitors who have flocked to that hostlery recently. During the Christian Endeavor rush, the records showed an arrival of some thirteen hundred and fifty-six guests in a day. A number of San Franciscans are among the present summer visitors, and the forthcoming "shoot," which is the subject of real interest in social circles, will probably bring down there a big contingent of fashionables from San Mateo, Menlo and San Rafael. The arrangements have not yet been made for the affair, but there is a great deal of incident at the caravansary, and for lovers of rod and reel excellent salmon fishing is reported.

It is noticeable that this season popular favor runs rather in the direction of camping, the freedom and lack of conventionality found in such outdoor life being especially fascinating. Maybe, however, the hard times have something to do with the fact that society in large numbers is turning its back on the usual centers of fashion. Yosemite has gathered in unlimited numbers of campers, and throuhout the Shasta region they have made inroads. In the Agua Caliente neighborhood numerous tiny tents are visible, and, indeed, for much the same reason, all nearby vicinages present an enlivened aspect. Niles Canyon, Mill Valley and Bolinas Bay are situations also favored by campers, male and female, who declare the joys of it are far more enjoyable than life in a summer caravansary—not to mention the economy.

An event of some interest was the wedding of Miss Charlotte Van der Naillen and Eugene H .Kast. It was celebrated last Wednesday at the church of Notre Dame des Victories, and foreign circles showed their interest by being present in numbers. The bride was gracefully gowned in white satin, and besides the usual bridesmaids, two little flower bearers attended her. The wedding was a decidedly pretty affair.

The announcement of the betrothal of Miss Rose Levingston, sister of Dr. Mark Levingston, to Mr A. Harris, is of interest. Miss Levingston is an exceedingly handsome girl, and has but just returned from the East, where she has been visiting for a year past. Mr. Harris is a manufacturer of textile fabrics in Boston, and is a man of position in the social and financial world.

August 2d has been chosen as the date for the marriage of Miss Laura Gashwiler and Mr. Samuel M. Shortridge. It will be a very quiet affair, celebrated at the home of the bride's mother on Central avenue, and witnessed only by relatives and a few intimates. However, Miss Gashwiler is already the recipient of many handsome presents, sent by friends of both families, and upon their return after the wedding Mr. and Mrs. Shortridge will take up their residence at the Palace Hotel, where the prospective groom has lived for many years

Miss Sadie Samuels, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. D. Samuels, whose betrothal to Mr. I. S. Foorman has been announced, will hold an engagement reception on next Sunday. Miss Samuels has been the recipient of many compliments over her engagement, and Mr. Foorman's friends are felicitating him on his intelligent choice of a bride.

Mrs. John D. Tallant, who has been traveling extensively since the death of her son Selden, is at present at Dresden, where she will remain for some time.

Considering the season and the predominance of hillside and seashore jollity, Oakland can scarcely be accused of sluggishness from a social standpoint. The suitable entertainment of some score of visitors probably furnishes the "raison d'etre" for this activity. The functions, however, seem to have been tempered to the times, and dignified dinners rather predominated over amusements of a lighter nature.

Quite the most elaborate of these affairs was the colonial dinner given by Miss Florence Sharon last Friday in honor of Miss Sarah Whitney. Miss Whitney leaves shortly for Paris to spend the next few years in the study of sculpture, in which line, it is to be hoped, success will crown her efforts. The invitations were closed and sealed in the old style, and the guests appeared in powder and patches and quaint gowns of colonial pattern. All the other details were in keeping—hand-painted cards, a central candelabrium and other accessories of the days of Washington and William Penn By way of conclusion the men and maids danced the minuet, and finished up with an old-time Virginia reel. On Thursday evening last Mr. Chris Miller entertained Miss Marguerite Jolliffe, Miss Amy McKee, Miss Donaldson of Philadelphia, Harry Miller, S B. McKee and Mr. and Mrs. Edson Adams at a dinner. Exotics and ferns formed the table decorations Miss Dorothy Goodsell gave a musical Saturday last for her pupils. Vocal numbers were rendered by the hostess and several guests. Oakland's jeunesse is to be congratulated on its persistency in coming forward in the matter of engagements, Miss Libbie Moffat's betrothal to Ernest Folger being the latest announcement to stir up social interest. The young people have a wide circle of friends, and society across the bay is looking forward to the marriage, which will take place next August.

The Reverend Dr. and Mrs. Lacey informally entertained Reverend Banning Richardson at a luncheon in Alameda. The guest of honor is Canon of the Cathedral at London, Ontario, and some thirty friends greeted him on this occasion.

Mrs. Louis P. Drexler has rented the Birkmaier place in Alameda for the summer, and will probably be joined a little later by Mrs. Captain Blair. Mrs. Dr. Daggett, nee Cohen, is also spending the midsummer months in Alameda as the guest of her brother Edgar.

The recent warm wave lent an extra impetus to society's summer hegira, and the list of departures is large. Judge Garber and family, together with Mr. Sam Bell McKee, have gone to Lake Tahoe for a ten days' sojourn, and to this resort have also repaired Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Harrub and Miss Kate Harrub during the present month. Mr. Horace Watson has been visiting in New York and Boston, and from the Orient news comes that Miss Ethel Moore is still in Japan. Professor Moses is also in Japan, taking his vacation there after the year's University work. Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Holt, Miss Grace Holt, and Miss Louise Summers have returned from Mill Valley, and Mrs. Prentice Selby and Miss Edith Selby are home from their outing in Santa Cruz. Mr. and Mrs. Orestes Pierce have concluded their Eastern trip, and from the glens and gorges of Shasta county the Glascocks bring accounts of a jolly outing. Mr. and Mrs. John Allbright's lengthy stay in Lake county is also terminated, and in Fruitvale Mrs. Howard Bray is entertaining Miss Compton, of Salt Lake During the past week the Misses Gage, the Misses Anita and Pauline Lohse, and Miss Florence Walker enjoyed the hospitality of Miss Kate Chabot at Villa Remi.

The prompt and proper use of a pure stimulant has saved many a human life. The famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey is the purest and best.

SAN RAFAEL IS GAY

The Smart Set Amuse Themselves Day by Day.

At San Rafael one talks of the last paper chase until Wednesday evening, and of the next until Saturday afternoon. There are other subjects, of course—such as horses and saddles—the proper cut of riding breeches and the style of leggins. It is astonishing what interesting controversies may be developed out of these incidentals. Indeed, I have been told of no little bitterness being engendered by the criticism which one gentleman passed on the manner in which a certain other gentleman tied his cravat. Nothing happened, though the critic was not invited to the rarebit party which the subject's wife gave next evening in the summer house. He revenged himself by means of a stag oyster party on the club-house veranda, which failed to break up until midnight—a late hour if you live at San Rafael and catch the 7:50 a. m. from all of which it will be evident the Horse is a factor in the life of Marin county, and if you don't ride you might as well be dumb.

On good authority it is said the last Paper Chase was the "best yet." This is a characteristic it shares with its predecessors, which were equally "better" immediately after they had happened. Mr. Boardman and Miss Bertha Smith led—that is, they had fifteen minutes start over a highly diversified course consisting of assorted foothillside and meadow and brush and a bit of redwood and other accessories of San Rafael scenery. From the Hotel Rafael they set forth spreading pink paper, and confusion among a variegated array of equines in and out of traces, English and other coachmen, fair lady whips and whippers-in, maids in habits, matrons in shirt-waists, not to mention the spectators who in summer array crowd the porch. Of course the confusion only exists for the outsiders. For the illuminati the scene resolves itself into thoroughbreds or plugs, Brewsters or imitations, drags, coaches, Victorias, carts, ponies or hunters. Otherwise the atmosphere was charged with anticipation, conversation on the stipulated subjects, no little excitement and a generous allowance of heat. Yes, the Sun had a front-row chair and not a cloud separated him from the occasion.

It is a long time that elapses between start and pursuit in a Paper Chase—not in fact, but in feeling. The spirited steeds (spirited for the moment) champ their bits and paw the gravel, which is expected of steeds at such a psychological moment, and their riders engage themselves in final preparations. Then—after this interminable delay—the word is given and lo! they go—they go—they thunder down the gravelled avenue, raising a spectacular cloud of dust. After them a procession of "rigs" following the equipage of Mr. Jack Crooks, who acts as the machinery of the entertainment, and alone knows where the finish may be discovered. There he plants flags on poles, and the carriage audience lines-up to form an annue through which the hounds gallop for the silver cups that reward the good luck of the first man in and the first maid there. Last Saturday the "finish" was in a field near Fairfax Villa, and Miss Moffitt of Oakland, a decidedly pretty young woman who rode a brilliant race, and Mr. Howard got home just in front of a bevy of competitors who dashed for the flags like the Assyrian that "came down like a wolf," etc. From the appearance of the hounds it might have been gathered that paper chasing, while good fun, is hard work. They panted and mopped their feverish brows and removed layers of dust from their complexions, and gave other signs and tokens of the severity of the bout. But they were happy, confoundedly joyous and excited, and charmed with themselves and reminiscent and explanatory and expostulatory. They were other things also, but most particularly, most extraordinarily thirsty. They were not thirsty long, however—although it may have seemed a long time, it really was not.

There were accidents—what is a chase without an opportunity for the doctor. This time a charming young lady was thrown from her spirited charger and was found lying senseless under a manzanita tree. "Water, water," demanded the doctor. Midsummer in San Rafael, with brown hills and dried grasses—why not ask for spring flowers. At the psychological moment the whipper-in appeared. From the depths of an interior pocket he produced an ancestral flask—silver mounted, allegorical, crested.

"Ten year old whiskey," he whispered to the medico. "Best on the Coast," he announced still louder.

"No good," declared the doctor.

"This ten year old whikey no good!" indignantly stipulated the whipper-in. "Just try it. I challenge you, sir, to an honorable arbitration."

"The girl must have water; whiskey can't help her, I tell you." The doctor was growing excited. Does no one know where we may find water, he demanded of the bystanders.

A small boy knew where a spring was. Yes, but how bring the water? No mugs, no jugs nor cups, nor bowls.

"There's the flask," suggested the doctor.

'But the whiskey, sir," implored the whipper-in.

"It's a lady, sir; don't hesitate."—the doctor grew emphatic.

Sadly and reluctantly the whipper-in unscrewed the stopper, took a long, long pull at the ten year old whiskey, and then with melancholy gurgle the precious liquor escaped into the dark, ungrateful ground. The flask was surrendered to the urchin, who darted off in the direction of the spring. He returned, downcast—the spring had dried up. I ring down the curtain on the pathos of this most solemn and somber scene.

AN INDISPENSABLE ARTICLE IN THE ICY GOLD FIELDS OF FAR ALASKA.

I send you some of the most wonderful whiskey that ever drove the skeleton from a feast or painted landscapes on the brain of man—the Jesse Moore "AA." It is the mingled soul of wheat, corn and rye. In it you will find the sunshine and shadow that chased each other o'er the billowy fields; the breath of June; the carol of the lark; the dews of night; the wealth of summer's and autumn's rich content, all golden with imprisoned light. Drink it, and you will hear the voice of men and maidens singing the Harvest Home, mingled with the laughter of children. Drink it, and you will feel within your blood the startled dawns, the dreaming, tawny dusks of many perfect days. For twelve years this liquid joy has been within the happy staves of oak longing to touch the lips of man.

DRAMATIC NOTES

The success of "Pudd'nhead Wilson" at the Columbia has been so pronounced that the management has decided to continue the play for another week. On August 2d "The Case of Rebellious Susan" will be presented, Frank Worthing and Blanche Bates reappearing in thecast.

The sale of seats for John Drew in "Rosemary" commences at the Baldwin next Wednesday morning. Much is expected of the play, and as Mr. Drew has made in it one of his greatest successes, and will present it here with a capable company, which includes Miss Isabel Irving, it is likely expectations will be realized. "The Heart of Maryland," with Mrs. Leslie Carter in her original role of Maryland Calvert, will follow Mr. Drew.

The Alcazar will put on a double bill next week, consisting of the comedy "Gloriana," and Clay M. Greene's one-act sketch "Relaimed," in which Francis Carlyle will appear as the hero. Miss Bengie Harrison, the new soubrette of the Alcazar Company, is a New York favorite of some reputation, and will likely continue her popularity in her San Francisco engagement. Francis Power' new play, "When Turk Meets Greek," is to be presented August 2d.

Papinta, the graceful and sensational myriad dancer, will appear next week at the Orpheum in some entirely new dances, introducing a number of novel and bewildering effects in light and color. Crawford and Manning, colored comedians, said to be inimitable and incomparable, have an amusing sketch, and the "Barrelatic" Deonzos, trick barrel jumpers, have a somewhat rolling novelty. The McKees, eccentric comedy duo, complete the list of new people.

"The Isle of Champagne" commences its third week at the Tivoli Monday evening, and from present indications might run for several weeks to come. The light, pleasing music of the opera has caught on immensely, and Edwin Stevens, as King Mumm, has literaally taken the town. The ballets form a graceful feature, and the scenery and light effects are out of the ordinary. Altogether the performance is thoroughly enjoyable, one of the most satisfactory San Francisco has had in a comic opera way for some time.

There is an exceptionally dramatic scene in "The Defaulter," the play to be given at Morosco's next week. It represents a run on a bank, and is most realistic and exciting, with the angry depositors clamoring for their money, each one struggling and fighting to the front fearful that the money on hand will not last till his turn comes. The play is by Lincoln J. Carter, author of "The Fast Mail," and is interesting and dramatic from beginning to end, with purity of tone, beauty of sentiment, amusing comedy and tearful pathos cleverly intermingled. The cast includes the regular company. Special stage effects have been prepared, and the performance promises to be altogether agreeable.

A MINER INTERVIEWED

Lot O. Goldinsight Gives His Views of the Clondyke.

Mr. Lot O. Goldinsight is in town, recently returned from the Klondyke region, where he has been spending a few weeks of the summer season hunting and fishing. Mr. L. O. Goldinsight reports excellent caribou shooting, and has brought with him a fine stand of horns. The salmon will rise to a fly on the Klondyke, according to the statements of this enthusiastic sportsman, at almost any time during the hot weather. During the intervals of his sport the gentleman employed his time shoveling gold dust into hogsheads.

"It is a very healthy exercise," remarked Mr. Goldinsight, "and especially good for the muscles of the back. I found it tiresome at first, but I assure you that at the end of my stay I could shovel my five hundred pounds per hour and never feel it. Have something to drink?" he added amably. "Won't you sit down?" He removed a flour-sack of gold dust from the bottom of an arm chair, and the reporter seated himself.

"By the way," said Mr. Goldinsight," I picked this up in your park to-day. It is really a very curious specimen; perhaps you can tell me something about it."

He handed the reporter a small round stone, such as is used in gravel walks. The reporter took it in his hand.

"Why sir," said the reporter, "it is merely a common pebble; we have 'em by the ton down here. It's gravel."

"Really, now," said Mr Goldinsight, "you surprise me. You know I've been on the Klondyke so long that possibly I might have forgotten. You never see gravel up there, you know. Some prospectors have gone out for it, and I believe one or two specimens have been found near the top of the gold deposits. But the percentage of gravel to gold is so small that I doubt if it will ever pay to mine it extensively. It won't run more than an ounce of gravel to a ton or more of gold."

Mr. Goldinsight carefully returned the pebble to its buckskin bag and locked it in his safe.

"I understand, sir," said the reporter, "that you have a couple of ship loads of gold dust on the way down."

"Ballast, merely ballast," returned Mr. Goldinsight airely. "I have an offer from a concrete paving company to whom I expect to dispose of the whole consignment. It is found that the gold dust mixes well with the mortar and sand, and makes a good, firm pavement."

Mr. Goldinsight was asked as to whether the finds of gold along the Klondyke would have an effect upon the value of lead.

"It is hardly possible," he assured the reporter. "It might be run into bullets, but the Winchester and Remington, and other firms are using the steel bullets so much of late that there will be practically no competition in that direction. For gas and water pipes—now there might be a market in that direction. But these gravel deposits you speak of down here—"

"Oh, there can be no doubt that the pebbles are here," answered the reporter.

"You don't think that the reports that have reached us along the Klondyke have been exaggerated?"

"Not in the least. You may say that the supply of pebbles along the ocean beach below the Cliff House is practically inexhaustible, and pebbles have been found as far south as Pescadero. There are even indications of pebbles and gravel in the Sierras and along the Mother Lode, but there they are so mixed with gold that they are considered of a low grade."

"When this news reaches the Klondyke," said Mr. Goldinsight, "I assure you there will be a rush for this place. The men there will have the pebble fever at once. The difficulty will be in getting out of Alaska. You know there are two routes—one down the Yukon and one, very dangerous, over Chilly-Cat Pass. However, when a man is picking up pebbles and gravel by the hatful he won't think of his past hardships. You know," continued Mr. Goldinsight, "I am about to incorporate a company."

"Indeed, for what purpose?"

"To mine for gravel hereabouts and transport it to the Klondyke; it would fetch something like 20 cents an ounce there."

"But what would the miners there want with it?"

"Well," said Mr. Lot. O. Goldinsight, "it would be a good thing to mix the gravel with our gold in order that we might pan the gold easier.

REJECTED DRAMAS

It is a singular fact that many of the most successful plays of the day were either failures when first produced or had been carried about from manager to manager before one could be found to put them on. "Shore Acres" was first presented at McVicker's Theater in Chicago and was a decided failure. To prevent a total collapse, a half-interest in the play, scenery and costumes was sold for $1,500—since then it has earned over $300,000, and is still popular.

William Gillette's 'Secret Service," now the rage in London, fell very flat on its original production a year ago. It was kept on the stage, cleared $75,000 this season, and Mr. Gillette has been offered by Charles Frohman $100,000 for his rights in the play. "The Heart of Maryland," which is to be seen at the Baldwin next monta, was several years getting a hearing, and A. M. Palmer after accepting it paid $2,500 forfeit to avoid producing it. After much difficulty and postponement it was put on and has made a fortune for everyone connected with it.

"Shenandoah" was rejected by nearly every New York manager. Since its premier it has cleared $200,000. Augustin Daly refused "Mme. Sans Gene" at $5,000, and Fanny Davenport could see nothing in it, yet Kathryn Kidder has made the fame and fortune of a lifetime as the titled wash lady. Even "Trilby" had its vicissitudes, for A. M. Palmer declared it easier to dramatize Bartlett's "Familiar Quotations" than make a play out of Du Maurier's story. It was four years before "My Friend From India" was produced, and then it was in a hurry, and at an expense of $450 It has cleared $60,000 this season, and is good for as much more. On the afternoon of the day "The Girl From Paris" was first played a one-third interest was sold for $1,500. It has just finished a run of 250 nights in New York, the net profits for the last six weeks exceeding $1,000 a week. "Alabama," one of the most delightful of all Southern plays, was brought out by Palmer as a "stop gap" for two weeks, there being absolutely nothing else on hand. It has made a small fortune for Augustus Thomas, as well as a lasting reputation. An Englishman purchased a one-third interest in "Charley's Aunt" for $2,500 and has realized about $100,000 from the investment.

BOOK NOTES

"After Her Death," by Lillian Whiting (Roberts Brothers), may be termed a tribute to Kate Field, whose portrait appears as the frontispiece. Miss Whiting possessed an unusually strong friendship for Miss Field, to which she gives expression in her little book, and at the same time writes in somewhat enraptured lines of the dead authoress. This enraptured strain runs through the whole work and dips into all sorts of questions of the quick and the dead and the life to come —somewhat vaguely at times, but with lofty vagueness.

It is a big undertaking to read "The Master Beggars," by L. Cope-Cornfield (J. B. Lippincott Company), and one hardly worth the trouble to take. The scene is set in Holland during the times of the Duke of Alva, and on almost every page is some sort of adventure, each one bloodier and more reckless than the other. The idea of the author was doubtless the production of an historical romance, but it falls flat and short of being either romance or history.

An excellent remedy for insomnia will be found in the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey, taken at bedtime. Your druggist has it.

LATE VERSE

March of the Girl Graduates.

They are coming, men and brethren.
Many hundred thousand strong;
They are pouring forth an army
Exceeding wide and long.
They are smiling, they are nodding,
And their plumes are waving high.
As each maiden lifts her banner
To the glorious shining sky.

They are full of mighty wisdom.
And the world their oyster is;
They have buckled on the armor,
And are ready now for biz.
They are ready for the battle,
And their war-cry fairly thrills;
Some will sprout as full-fledged lawyers,
Some as mixers up of pills.

Man, poor, craven man, before them
Flees afar and hides his head,
For the ground is charmed completely
By the beauteous army's tread.
Man's a second fiddler sawing
Sadly on a single strand,
In the face of such an army
Swarming wildly o'er the land.

They'll be filling all the places
Filled by poor prosaic man;
They'll be claiming all the options,
Bossing ev'ry scheme and plan.
And the one nice way to stop them
In their stalwart, onward stride
Is to woo them and to win them,
And to make each one a bride!

—H. S. Keller.

Evolution.

When Esmeralda got her wheel
And first began to ride,
She wore a long and graceful skirt
That was her joy and pride;
But soon her equanimity
Received a dreadful check—
Rude Boreas took that graceful skirt
And wrapped it 'round her neck!

She gathered all her mental force
To solve this monstrous riddle,
She lengthwise cut her riding skirt
Exactly in the middle.
She shortened it and then did sew
A seam on either side,
And in her new divided skirt
She proudly forth did ride.

But when she'd worn it just a week
She heard a dreadful rumor—
Divided skirts had lately been Succeeded by the Bloomer.
She put a wide elastic band
In the hem below the knee,
Which made as neat a bloomer
As one would wish to see

But to her most aesthetic eye
It really seemed distasteful,
The way those bloomers flopped about
Was shocking and disgraceful.
So she took them to a tailor
Who fitted, sewed, and pressed,
And now she rides in knickerbockers
As beauteous as the rest.

To a Queen.

O queenliest of queens,
The world admits thy sway;
Boston itself bows down
Before thy royal crown—
The beanliest of beans
Confess thy might to-day.

From Canada's bleak hills
To India's coral rills
One wild, fierce rapture thrills
The subject soul;
The dark Australian glows,
The hairy Canuck shows,
The woolly Capeman knows
Thy sway from Pole to Pole.

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

AN AMERICAN NOVEL

Vigorous Characterization in Dr. Weir Mitchell's "Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker."

That "Hugh Wynne, Free Quaker," is on the verge of conclusion will cause some readers of the "Century" regret, though it may be welcome intelligence to others who have permitted themselves to long for the success of Washington and the surrender of Miss Darthea Peniston, both events having been delayed an unconscionable number of months through the necessities of serial publication. Several other important points remain to be settled, among them the feud between Hugh and his cousin, Captain Arthur Wynne, who is several kinds of a gentlemanly villain endowed with a veritably Machiavellian form of subtlety. There is no denying the interest that Dr. Weir Mitchell's story has inspired. He has certainly made a virile tale out of this narrative of the life and times of Hugh Wynne. It may be felt that the war scenes lack something of vivacity and concentration, but the strength, earnestness and distinctness with which the characterization of the hero, his Quaker father, his mother, Aunt Gainor and Miss Darthea are accomplished, make the book important as literature as well as entertaining as fiction. The several portraits are at full length—but they are completely realized and consistently rendered.

The strenuous figure of John Wynne, the father of the hero—"a proud, strong man, he was in those days of fixed beliefs, and of unchanging loyalty to the King. In his own house he was feared by his son, his clerks and his servants; outside his own walls few men cared to oppose him. He was rich and coldly despotic; a man exact and just in business"—stands out a potent factor in the tale. His wife, Marie, is a delicious portrait—a tender, loving and most fascinating woman, whose realization is a real achievement. The orphan of a French gentleman become Quaker, she invests the austerity of that strict sect with a delightful demureness, a Gallic vivacity, the actual impression of which the narrative conveys. Here she appears to us:

"This sweet and most tender-hearted lady wore a gray gown and a blue chintz apron fastened over the shoulders with wide bands. On her head was a very broad-brimmed, white beaver hat, low in the crown and tied by silk cords under her chin. She had a great quantity of brown hair, among which was one wide strand of gray. It was all very silken, and so curly that it was ever in rebellion against the customs of Friends, who would have it flat on the temples. She had serious, blue eyes, very large and wide open, so that the clear white was seen all around the blue, and with a constant look as of gentle surprise. Her goodness seemed instinctive, and to have needed neither thought nor effort. Her faults were mostly such as arise from excess of loving and noble moods."

As for Hugh, the hero, he grows up strong and brave and healthy, fearing his stern father and loving passionately the kind, spirited mother—grows up a Quaker, ruled by the dictates of that sect, compelled to cultivate their virtues, but, as life goes, he becomes a backslider and grows dissipated through frequenting the society of young British officers, who lead him into wrong ways of living, from which his mother and his best friend, Jack Warder, finally rescue him. As a Quaker, John Wynne is all for the policy of non-resistance, believing it contrary to the law of God to oppose the authority of the Crown. His sister, Aunt Gainor, however, is an ardent upholder of liberty, and through her support and the teachings of John Wilson, Hugh takes the side of the Colonists against Great Britain, and in the face of his father's opposition, goes off to join Washington at Valley Forge. In those days, before the Rebellion feeling ran high in Philadelphia, and the opposing forces—Whigs and Tories—gathered at the home of Aunt Gainor, who was a leader of society in the Quaker settlement, though by no means a Quaker herself. Here is a picture of an entertainment at that era in the home of Andrew Hamilton:

On the porch were Mr. Hamilton and Mrs. Penn, with saucy gray eyes, and Mrs. Ferguson. A slim young girl, Rebecca Franks, was teasing a cat. She teased some one all her days, and did it merrily, and not unkindly. She was little and very pretty, with a dark skin. Did she dream she should marry a British soldier—a baronet and general—and end her days in London well on in the century yet to come?

Andrew Allen, whose father, the Chief Justice, took his wife Margaret from this house, sat on the steps near Miss Franks, and beside her litle Peggy Shippen, who already gave promise of the beauty which won for her so pitiful a life. Nothing in this garden of gay women and flowers foretold the tragedy of West Point. I think of it now with wonder.

In one or another way these people became known in our annals. Most of them were of the more exclusive party known as the Governor's set, and belonged to the Church of England. With the Galloways, Cadwaladers, Willings, Shippens, Chews, and others, they formed a more or less distinct society, affecting London ways, dining at the extreme hour of four, loving cards, the dance, fox-hunting, and to see a main of game-cocks. Among them—not of them—came and went certain of what were called "genteel" Quakers—Morrises, Pembertons, Whartons and Logans. They had races, too that is, the Governor's set—and one of my delights was, on the way to the academy, to stop in Third street, above Chestnut, and see the racehorses in Widow Nichol's stables at the sign of the Indian Queen.

But I have left the laughter of the last century echoing among the columns of Andrew Hamilton's home. The guests were made welcome, and had a dish of tea or a glass of punch; and those desiring no more bohea set a spoon across the cup, and fell into groups. My aunt opened the velvet bag which hung at her waist to pay Mrs. Ferguson a small gambling debt of the night before.

"Ah, here!" she cried gaily, "Mr. Montresor, this is for you. One of Mr. Grenville's stamps; I kept two. I was lucky enough to get them from Master Hughes, the stamp officer—a great curiosity. You shall have one."

Mr. Montresor bowed. "I will keep it," he said, "until it comes into use again."

"That will be never," said Andrew Allen, turning.

"Never!" repeated Miss Wynne. "Let us hope, sir, it may be a lesson to all future ministers."

"A man was wanted in New York in place of Mr. Gage," cried Mrs. Ferguson. "As to those New England Puritans, they were in rebellion before they came over, and have been ever since."

"And what of New York, and this town, and Virginia?" said my Aunt Gainor, with her great nose well up.

"I would have put an end to their disloyal ways, one and all," cried Mrs. Ferguson.

"It is curious," said Mr. Galloway, "that the crown should be so thwarted. What people have more reason to be contented?"

"Contented!" said Miss Wynne. "Already they talk of taxes in which we are to have no voice. Contented! and not a ship dare trade with France! It amazes me that there is a man in the plantations to sit quiet under it."

"I am of your opinion, madam," said Mr. Macpherson, "and I might go still further."

"They consider us as mere colonials, and we may not so much as have a Bishop of our own. I would had I my way, sir."

"And what would you do, Mistress Wynne," asked Mr. Chew.

"I would say, 'Mr. Attorney-General, give us the same liberty all the English have, to go and come on the free seas!' "

"And if not?" said Montresor, smiling.

"And if not," she returned, "then—" and she touched the sword at his side. I wondered to see how resolute she looked.

The Captain smiled. "I hope you will not command a regiment, madam."

"Would to God I could!"

There is a heroine, of course, Miss Darthea Peniston, a most captivating and beguiling young woman, whose fascinations have a dangerous effect on all the men in the volume, especially on Hugh Wynne and his cousin, Captain Arthur. Here is the young lady at the moment of her formal entrance into the story:

For a moment I did not reply. She wore a silken brocade with little broidered roses here and there, a bodice of the same, cut square over a girl-like neck, white, and not yet filled up. Her long gloves were held up to the sleeve by tightens of plaited white horse hair, which held a rosebud in each tie; and her hair was braided with a ribbon, and set high in coils on her head, with but little powder. As she came to meet us she dropped a curtsey, and kissed my aunt's hand, as was expected of young people.

I have tried since to think what made her so unlike other women. It was not the singular grace which had at once struck my cousin; neither was she beautiful. I long after hated Miss Chew for an hour because she said Darthea Peniston had not one perfect feature. She had, notwithstanding, clear, large brown eyes, and a smile which was so variously eloquent that no man saw it unmoved. This was not all. Her face had some of that charm of mystery which a few women possess—a questioning look; but, above all, there was a strange flavor of feminine attractiveness, more common in those who are older than she, and fuller in bud; rare, I think, in one whose virgin curves have not yet come to maturity. What she was to me that summer evening she was to all men—a creature of many moods, and of great power to express them in face and voice. She was young, she loved admiration, and could be carried off her feet at times by the follies of the gay world.

After many vexatious delays Hugh goes off to join Washington at Valley Forge, undertakes expeditions of great danger and daring, is imprisoned during many months, escapes through the kindness of Darthea, then assists in the occupation by the Colonists of Philadelphia, is on the staff of Benedict Arnold and is almost involved in his treason. Here, however, is a fine picture of Washington, presumably written by Hugh's friend, Jack Warder:

"Abler pens than mine," says Jack, "have put on record the sorrowful glory of that dreadful camp-ground by Valley Forge. It is strongly charactered in those beseeching letters and dispatches of the almost heart-broken man who poured out his grief in language which even to-day no man can read unmoved. To us he showed only a gravely tranquil face, which had in it something which reassured those starving and naked ones. Most wonderful is it, as I read what he wrote to inefficient, blundering men, to see how calmly he states our pitiful case, how entirely he controls a nature violent and passionate beyond that of most men. He was scarcely in the saddle as commander before the body which set him there was filled with dissatisfaction.

"I think it well that we know so little of what went on within the walls of Congress. The silence of history has been friendly to many reputations. There need be no silence as to this man, nor any concealment, and there has been much. I would have men see him as we saw him in his anger, when no language was too strong; in his hour of serene kindness, when Hamilton, the aide of twenty, was 'my boy'; in his starving camp, with naked men shivering all night in their blankets by the fires, when 'he pitied those miseries he could neither relieve nor prevent.' Am I displeased to tnink that although he laughed rarely he liked Colonel Scammel's strong stories, and would be amused by a song such as no woman should hear?

"This serene, inflexible, decisive man, biding his hour, could be then the venturesome soldier, willing to put every fortune on a chance, risking himself with a courage that alarmed men for his life. Does any but a fool think he could have been all these things and not have had in him the wild blood of passion? He had a love for fine clothes and show. He was, I fear, at times extravagant, and, as I have heard, could not pay his doctor's bill, and would postpone that, and send him a horse and a little money to educate his godson, the good doctor's son. As to some of his letters, they contained jests not gross, but not quite fit for grave seigniors not virginibus puerisque. There is one to Lafayette I have been shown by the Marquis. It is most amusing, but—oh, fie! Was he religious? I do not know. Men say so. He might have been, and yet have had his hours of ungoverned rage or of other forms of human weakness. Like a friend of mine, he was not given to speech concerning his creed."

During one of the hero's excursions into Philadelphia he is saved from capture and death by his friend Major Andre. Subsequently this popular officer, having assisted in the corruption of General Arnold, is captured and condemned to death as a spy. Washington permits Hugh to visit him, and he is conducted into the presence of the unfortunate prisoner.

I went at once—it was now close to eight in the evening—to the small house of one Maby, where the prisoner was kept. It was but an hundred yards from his Excellency's quarters. Six sentries marched to and fro around it, and within the room two officers remained day and night with drawn swords. My pass was taken at the door of the house, while I waited on the road without. In a few minutes an officer came to me with Major Tallmadge's compliments, and would I be pleased to enter?

I can see to-day the rising moon, the yellowish road, the long, gray stone farmhouse of one story, with windows set in an irregular frame of brickwork. The door opens, and I find myself in a short hall, where two officers salute as I pass. My conductor says, "This way, Captain Wynne," and I enter a long, cheerless-looking apartment, the sitting-room of a Dutch farmhouse. Two Lieutenants, seated within at the doorway, rose as I entered, and, saluting me, sat down again. I stood an instant looking about me. A huge log fire roared on the hearth, so lighting the room that I saw the glow catch the bayonet tips of the sentinels outside as they went and came. There were a half-dozen wooden chairs, and on a pine table four candles burning, a bottle of Hollands, a decanter and glasses. In a high-backed chair sat a man with his face to the fire. It was Andre. He was tranquilly sketching, with a quill pen, a likeness of himself. He did not turn or leave off drawing until Captain Tomlinson, one of the officers in charge, seeing me pause, said:

"Your pardon, Major. Here is a gentleman come to visit you."

As he spoke the prisoner turned, and I was at once struck by the extreme pallor of his face even as seen in the red light of the fire. His death-like whiteness at this time brought out the regular beauty of his features as his usual ruddiness of color never did. I have since seen strong men near to certain death, but I recall no one who, with a serene and untroubled visage, was yet as white as was this gentleman.

What is here suggested gives but the flavor of a charming story. There is not space to describe the vivid incidents that relieved the hero's childhood—the fights, the duels, the contests of his manhood, the meetings of the Friends, the scenes at Aunt Gainor's home, the tender passages between Hugh and his mother, and subsequently between him and Darthea. They will repay perusal, however, and doubtless will, in book form, earn that wide popularity an honest and well written American story is safe to command.

"Pudd'nhead Wilson" as Rendered by the Frawleys.

At the Columbia this week one is far more interested in the play than in the actors or their interpretation of the characters assumed. It is not often this happens, and when it does, it is the result of one of two causes, either the play is of unusual strength or the actors are of unusual mediocrity. It is much more likely that "Pudd'nhead Wilson" is one of the strongest plays that Frawley has given us this season. In the title role, however, Hamilton is a disappointment, not because he is positively bad, but because he is merely negatively good. There is an opportunity in this role for actual "star" work. But at no time during the evening did Hamilton really have a hold upon his audience. It will not do to say that the house followed his lines and business with breathless interest during the close of the last act. At that moment—the critical moment in the play—it was only the situation that was interesting, and it was to this the audience gave its attention, not to Mr. Hamilton.

Right here one is tempted to criticise even the lines of Mr. Hamilton's address to the jury—at least, his closing words. As the accused impostor collapses upon the floor Pudd'nhead, turning to the jury, says, "I have done." It would have been a thousand times more effective, and at the same time less melodramatic had Pudd'nhead addressed to the Judge the usual legal formula, "We rest our case here." It seems very trivial to niggle over details such as these in a printed criticism, but heard across the footlights during the actual progress of the play they have an importance far greater than one imagines. And while we are on the subject of detail, it is worth while noting another oversight. The whole complication turns upon the mark of a bloody thumb—the ball of the thumb—upon a knife hilt. There are innumerable chances against the possibility of a thumb mark in such a spot. Nine hundred and ninety-nine people out of a thousand in grasping the hilt of a knife would close the fingers over the haft and the thumb over the fingers. It is next to impossible to grip a knife securely in any other manner; and again, it is hard to understand how, with the thumb in this position, it could be stained with blood. Contrast this with the admirably natural manner in which Pudd'nhead finally secures the all-important thumb-mark of Roxy's son, when he catches up the glass between thumb and finger about and dash it on the ground.

It cannot be said that Mr. Hamilton struck the right note when, in the scene with Rowy (Miss Wallis), he first notices the discrepancies in the thumb-marks of the two boys. He has made no important discovery. His suspicions as to the interchange of the children are not aroused. He merely fancies he has, perhaps, made a mistake in labeling the marks. He is under the influence of no violent emotion. Why, then, this gasping and staggering, why this absurd blinking of the eyes, this fallen jaw and trembling hand. Mr. Hamilton overdoes the whole thing, forces the situation in order to bring about a climax of the act. Nor is the audience ever clearly aware of the exact instant when the right solution dawns upon him. In his speech to the jury he suddenly makes the charge and indicates the real Chambers, speaking of the matter as though he had known it for some time.

We had heard so much of Moretti in her role of Roxy that we had gone expecting, perhaps, too much. Miss Moretti overacts almost continually, the one notable exception being in the scene with her son when she discloses to him his relationship. Her negro laugh is a poor makeshift. She chooses to guffaw like a full negress, not at alll like a girl who was all but white. It is not at all enective, and the audience soon tires of it. In the prologue, where her child is on his way to be baptized as a white boy, she is by no means convincing, standing perfectly still, one hand raised and the eyes dilated may be a striking pose; it does not pass with the house for good acting. There are a thousand and one different dramatic situations, all familiar to the theater-goer, where such a pose has been used.

Gladys Wallis and Mr. Enos were in admirable contrast to Hamilton and Miss Moretti. Miss Wallis is first, last and always good; as Rowy she is as natural as a bird delivering her lines as though she had actually but that very instant thought of the words, while in the scene between the two boys, where Chambers compels Roxy's son to apologize for his insult—as serious a situation as we ever remember to have seen Miss Wallis attempt—she showed herself quite capable of something better than mere "ingenue work." Enos was especially strong as Roxy's scapegrace offspring, and was the vicious, mean-spirited "yaller coon" to the life. Ross' Chambers was as good as anything he has done this season, and Lewers as the French Count was dignified and restrained.

The combined attractions of "Rosedale" and Francis Carlyle have resulted in large houses at the Alcazar throughout the week. The play seems to have lost little of its old-time popularity, for every telling scene and thrilling climax, especially that of the fourth act, is watched with close interest and enthusiastically applauded. Mr. Carlyle looks very much as he did on his last visit—a trifle stouter, perhaps. His acting has improved with experience, and would be thoroughly agreeable were it not for a somewhat decided affectation which, doubtless, he considers effective, but in reality detracts very much from his work. George Osborne has an opportunity for good, heavy work as Miles McKenna, and succeeds in making it the strongest character in the play. Hugo Toland reappears as Matthew Leigh, and George Trader plays Bunberry Kob, the sporting squire of Kob Hall. Adele Belgarde has a number of conflicting emotions as Lady Florence May, and is properly discreet and acceptable in portraying them. May Buckley deserves commendation for her work as the light-minded Sarah; it is a part easily exaggerated, but Miss Buckley gives nature the benefit of the doubt and affords us a clever bit of art.

Variety is the spice of vaudeville as well as of existence, and there is much of it this week at the Orpheum. Miss Ida Gray Scott, an operatic soprano, sings with rather brilliant effect the polacca from "Mignon," and immediately after Perry and Burns [illegible] rushing on with word that Gilligan's [illegible] tear again. Miss Scott has a voice [illegible] vaudeville—it is clear and well controlled and used with good effect, noticeably in "Coming Thro' the Rye." Francis J. Bryant, a monologist, sings a little and talks a lot—he should reverse this order of things, for his singing is as pleasing as his wit is lame. Ouda, an aerial marvel from Australia, performs on the flying trapeze and walks on a ladder with his toes, all of which has been done before, but not with the grace and action that Ouda puts in it. Lew Dockstadter is in his last week, and is as much the whole show as he was during his first. Miss Imogene Comer is also in her last week. This young woman has a good appearance, and introduces some novel and dramatic effects, but just why she persists in singing distressing songs about people drowning and dying by other methods is altogether incomprehensible.

TURF TOPICS

Events on Eastern Tracks—Breeding Notes—Turf Congress Rules.

Even though the Yukon gold-fields exclude every other thought, the chronicles of sport must have right of way. For are not mining men most ardent lovers of the turf, whether working for wages with a pick in a pit or themselves owners of the nether earth hiring labor? They are invariably sportsmen at heart, with just sufficient of the gambling instinct in their make-up to give them a zest for life. In this far Western country amongst the chief pillars of the racing and breeding fabric, that have been and are, we find such names as Haggin, Daly, Hobart, Hearst, Cook, Baldwin, Boyd and Burns, all mighty in the mining world. And it is so in every land The turf is no sphere for the selfish cormorant, the counterpart of the sure-thing gambler, who monopolizes trade, or dilutes and manipulates corporation stocks for public consumption. The more gold there is found in the North-west the better for the turf. But while we are waiting let it be remembered that there are lots of good claims to be staked in the horse world, without having to imperil body and soul in the process, and that there is nothing much better as a productive asset than a really good stallion or broodmare, or a first-class performer on the race-course. That the annals of the turf need ttle study to discover.

The American Turf Congress has decided to outlaw any track within its jurisdiction that shall permit a foreign book to be operated after August 1st, the ban to include owners, trainers, jockeys, track officials and horses employed or racing on such tracks.

Certain requirements as to the minimum daily value of purses are also to take effect from same date. These regulations are calculated to encourage sport of a better class, and to check the gambling evil.

The defeat of Ornament in the Buckeye stakes, one and one-eighth miles, at Oakley last Saturday, should not be made too much of. The colt has been given a hard season and had begun previously to show that he needed rest. He was, moreover, three lengths or so behind at the start, with the course in muddy condition, both incidents being calculated to tell against a horse when not in good heart. He thus failed to collar Fleischman 112 pounds, and being beaten a couple of lengths had to put up with second place. Fleischman was previously a maiden.

The Coney Island Jockey Club summer meeting proved a decided success, save for the display of feeling on the closing day at the result of the Realisation, won by The Friar, in the fastest time ever made for the event The performance of the horse was a notable one, as he made all his own running for the mile and five furlongs, carrying 115 pounds, and won by three-quarters of a length in 2:48 2-5. It amounted, however, to a complete reversal of the colt's form in the last few weeks, and the once popular Morris colors were loudly execrated by the race-going public The Friar is said to be a horse of highly nervous temperament that cannot be depended upon to show his best form unless he is fortunate enough to find a place in front at the beginning of a race. He was beaten on the Monday following by Ben Brush in the mile and one-quarter Brighton handicap, after setting the pace for the first mile in 1:41¾. It is only right to say that after an official investigation the stewards of the Jockey Club expressed themselves satisfied that there was no attempt at wrongdoing on the part of the owners and trainer of The Friar, in connection with his running during the Coney Island meeting.

A good 2-year-old of the year is Hanburg, by Hanover out of the Fenowcraft mare Lady Reel, a daughter of Mannie Gray by Enquirer. He is the property of Mr. J. E. Madden, for whom he has won the $20,000 Great Trial Stakes and the $5,000 Double Event. There seems to be an impression that he is likely to prove the best 2-year-old of the season, though his owner claims he has a better one in Howland. In the first mentioned race Hamburg met a really good field of youngsters and defeated them in style.

They seem to have patented a good nick at Rancho del Paso in mating imp. Sir Modred with the Virgil mare, Sweetbriar. The renowned Dr. Hasbrouck and Dr. Helmuth were of this parentage; and now we have the filly Briarsweet, their full sister, owned by Marcus Daly, earning distinction by winning the Vernal Stakes for 2-year-old fillies, five furlongs, cleverly by a length and a half. Geisha second, in 1:01 4-5. Mr. Daly secured a full brother to the filly at the late Haggin sale of yearlings for $4,000.

Though far from being in thoroughly healthy condition, racing is in a better plight throughout the country than it has been for a long time, and as far as California is concerned we are justified in anticipating a good season again next winter. The mining, agricultural and fruit interests are all in much improved shape, and this is sure to have a beneficial effect

BENEDICT.

THE CITY HALL DOME

Masterly and Tasteful Work of the Contractors Employed.

Now that Mr. Frank Shea (of the firm of Shea & Shea) has completed his work upon the rotunda of the City Hall dome, it may be as well to cast a glance at what really has been accomplished, and review in somewhat of detail the different portions of the construction which represent the accumulated labor of some of the most able contractors of the city.

The fine effects of light that have been obtained from the unique glass dome is due to the efforts of the Pacific American Decoration Company, whose office is 26 O'Farrell street. This company has fulfilled the terms of its contract (the largest of its kind ever signed on this coast) to the letter, and the rich, warm light that is diffused throughout the enclosed space is as beautiful an effect as could be desired by the most critical taste. The same effect can be produced at night by means of a huge cluster of electric lights in the lantern

The carpentry and wood fittings are the handiwork of J. F. Leahy, of Leahy Bros., of 505 Parrott Building, and are in admirable harmony with the rest of the design, nor can the least adverse criticism be passed upon the manner of execution.

The judgment and good taste of Joseph McKenna, who, as an expert decorator, was appointed by the Commissioners to supervise the ornamental part of the construction, is apparent at every turn. Everything has been carried out with perfect good taste, and a result has been reached that is brilliant in the extreme without being ostentatious.

The visitor to the rotunda can hardly fail to be impressed with the beauty and richness of the copper work on railings, balustrades, capitals of columns and supports of the dome, etc. The San Francisco Novelty and Plating Works had this part of the work in charge, and though it is the first example of this kind of work that has been produced in this city, it will lose nothing by comparison with the best efforts of Eastern contractors. The price paid for this work, it is said, was $86,000, but even a casual inspection of the result will show that it was cheap at the price.

Mr. H. McCormick, of 115 City Hall Avenue, has reason to be proud of the result of his work in the matter of marble. This has come from the Amador quarries, and has been pronounced by the knowing as much superior to the Italian; it is of a white veined variety and extremely beautiful.

Mr. McCormick is also the San Francisco agent for the exquisite green marble that has been used in the wainscotting of the second gallery, quite 2,000 feet of the wall has been covered, and the general effect is peculiarly striking. This marble, we are told, is a new product of the State, coming from the Kimball quarry of San Diego. We hope it is an earnest of more to follow. Another variety of marble used is from the well-known travertine quarry in Mono County, whose offices are at 28 Eighth street in this city.

Two Inky Ways.

There was a man who advertised
But once—a single time.
In spot obscure placed he his ad
And paid for it a dime.

And just because it didn't bring Him customers by score,
"All advertising is a fake"
He said, or, rather, swore.

He seemed to think one hammer tap
Would drive a nail clear in;
That from a bit of tiny thread
A weaver tents could spin.

If he this reasoning bright applied
To eating, doubtless he Would claim one little bite would feed
Ten men a century.

Some day, though, he will learn that to Make advertising pay
He'll have to add ads to his ad,
And advertise each day.

—E. G. Townsend.

The May Queen.

With a blanket about her shoulders,
A hot brick against her toes,
She sits, while a mustard plaster
Makes her chest like the blushing rose;
And her manner is sad and pensive,
And her glances are far away,
And she vows that she never, no, never more
Will consent to be "Queen of the May."

—Washington Star.

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

Coventry Patmore and Tennyson were, in their younger days, great friends. The latter had quarreled with his landlady, and in consequence left her house in disgrace. As he was walking away with Patmore he remembered suddenly that he had left on the table in his room the manuscript of "In Memoriam." As he positively refused to face the irate hostess again, Patmore offered to return for the poem. He rushed back and found the landlady fuming, standing in the doorway. She dared him to enter. Patmore made a football rush, got into the room, and there, in the table drawer, beside a piece of bacon, found the lost manuscript. He got out without damage, though that was not the landlady's fault

Mrs. Caroline Corbin, the anti-woman's suffrage leader of Chicago, went to school with Susan B. Anthony. Years after the two women met in Washington and Miss Anthony asked: "What have you been doing all these years?" "Bringing up four boys," answered Mrs. Corbin. "Boys! scornfully exclaimed the outspoken Susan. "What under the sun is a woman with your brains doing with four boys." "Would you have me strangle them?" was the retort. "Bosh," was the emphatic answer, "you should never have had them. They will grow up to be men—nothing but men." It was after this that Mrs. Corbin became an an..-suffragist.

Lord Westbury, about whom a series of reminiscences appear in the last "Cornhill," had a keen wit. A certain young Irish lawyer on one occasion attended a consultation in his chambers previous to an appeal from the Irish courts to the House of Lords, and discoursed with some volubility on the matter in question. "Really, Palmer," said Westbury, after a time to Lord Selborne, who was also in the case, "this loquacious savage appears to know some law." This remark, uttered in the softest voice and in meditative tones, speedily brought the too-talkative attorney to a standstill.

Captain Baden-Powell gives this dialogue in his "Matabele Campaign," as illustrating the topsy-turvy nature of military discipline inevitable in mixed volunteer troops. Sentry, who has been ordered not to smoke: "What—not smoke on sentry? Then where the mischief am I to smoke?" Captain Brown: "It's not allowed, and I shall make you a prisoner." Sentry, taking his pipe from his lips and tapping Brown—his butcher in peace-time—on the arm with the stem: "Now, look here, Brown, don't go and make an infernal fool of yourself! If you do, I'll go elsewhere for my meat!"

An old-time Lord Mayor of London, whose sporting experience was limited, rode forth one day to join the city hunt in the fields about Marylebone. Placed by his escort under a tree, his Lordship heard the hounds give tongue in the distance, and the sounds grew louder and louder, till one of the city scouts shouted out, "The hare comes this way, my Lord!" The Lord Mayor rose to the occasion, and, drawing his sword, he exclaimed hercically: "Let him come! I thank my God I fear him not!"—Household Words.

Ex-Governor Altgeld tells this story on himself: When he was running for Governor last fall one of his supporters asked a Swede to support him. The Swede shook his head and said: "No; that man is a bad man. He is an anarchist, socialist and everything that is bad. I will not vote for him." "Oh, he is not as bad as that," said Altgeld's friend. "He is a pretty good man. There are no flies on him." "That is vere one flies show they have got some sense," immediately replied the Swede.

Lord Westbury, before he became a Judge, was associated with a clever young lawyer in an important case. As leader he made a strong argument, and his young associate, who was to follow, remarked as they retired for luncheon, "that you have made a strong impression on the court." "I think so, too," said Westbury; "don't disturb it."

An old Scotchman who had been opposed to instrumental music in the church he attended, was asked what he thought of the organ that had been introduced. "Man," was the reply, "I'm feared I'm gaun to like it."

They had had a little party of guests at the house, and he remarked to his wife as he was getting ready for bed, that he flattered himself he had acted the part of host in rather a brilliant manner. "I can only recall one brilliant action of yours," she said. "What was that?" "Lighting the gas."

THE RUSH TO ALASKA.

If it were authoritatively announced that at the North Pole was to be found a solid block of gold worth millions, all the fruitless and labored voyages of scientists would be put to shame very shortly by the return to civilization of some hardy American with a large chunk of the golden Pole in his pockets. Wherever there is money to be found or money to be made, there the Anglo-Saxon will be. It mattered nothing to him that he had to fight his way through bands of butchering savages, and across the waterless deserts and climb the jagged mountains with their coverlet of snow, to reach the placers of California. He has fought his way against the assegais of the fierce natives of Southern Africa, from the Cape to the center of the Dark Continent, hunting for gold and reefs. He has built towns on the dry and dusty plains of Western Australia with the nearest water fifty miles away. He has gone into the heart of the Guinea swamps where every breath is poisoned and every cup of water a death draught. And now by the tens of thousands he plans to cut his way in ice across the steepes of the Northern Rockies, and shoot through rapids filled with floating ice into the Arctic Circle where men say there is gold for the taking. Great is the Anglo-Saxon, daring everything, fearing nothing where there is gold as the reward. No torture has been discovered that is too terrible, no climate so severe as to hold back men of our race from going where there is promise of wealth.

The world's imagination has been set on fire by this new discovery in the Northwest Territory. Not since '49, and perhaps not then, even, were men so aroused and excited over the possibilities of gathering quick fortunes on the the banks of streams and the sides of mountains. In '49 the times were comparatively easy; there were not so many people in the United States, there was an immense area of valuable unoccupied land; the Strike, the Boycott, the Labor Union, the Lock-out, the Trust and the Syndicate, fortunes $100,000,000 and marching Coxey's Armies were all unknown in '49. The pressure of civilization did not bear so hard; in America there was then no word of the "Submerged Tenth;" there was still space and opportunity in the Western States for men who wished for adventure and romance, and ample scope for men of daring and enterprise to make great fortunes without moving from their father's threshold. No, not in '49 did the discovery of this Western Eldorado bring such excitement and such hope as have been brought to the people of the United States by the Alaskan discovery of '97. If we must look for a parallel we must go back to the early part of the sixteenth century, when the Spanish Galleons returned from Mexico with ballasts of silver bricks and cargoes of gold and precious stones. Then the poor and the landless as well as the rich and lordly went wild over the news that the Spanish brought.

Men's imaginations work rapidly at such times as this. The stupid and sluggish who have fallen into the dull routine of life now come forward with schemes rivaling in boldness those of our commercial Napoleons. The quiet, digging lawyer, the cautious man of business, no less than the adventurer, dwell night and day upon the delights that will be theirs in seducing from the soil her virgin gold. The prospect of wealth fires the imagination and sets the mind ablaze. Obstacles to enterprises that would seem insurmountable at ordinary times are laughed at as the mere incidents of a pleasure trip. It is safe to say that in the city of San Francisco 10,000 men who would no more have thought of climbing the Chilkoot Pass than of swimming across the Pacific ocean, are to-day planning and anxiously looking forward to a time when they can cut their way in steps of ice across that mountain range. Young men who had minimized their ambitions to the prospect of a life of humble clerkship have all at once become possessed of the idea that with grit and a side of bacon they can arrive at independence. Old men whose hearts have not felt the tingle of rushing blood for a score of years, talk seriously of the grand, exhilarating life they will lead upon the Yukon. Once again there bursts into being all that passion and fire which sent men by the million, century after century, crusading through Europe and Asia in the name of the Cross. Materialism, civilization and progress cannot quell the spirit of romance, and from that spirit comes not only the enterprise which makes fortunes and builds up empires, but that kindling of the mind, that eruption of mental force which produces genius and stimulates to the production of noble achievement in literature and art.

THE CONDITION OF CUBA.

The adjournment of Congress leaves the Cuban question exactly where it was, so far as our Government is concerned, at the beginning of the session. The passage of the Morgan resolution indicated conclusively that the temper of the State was entirely in favor of the insurgents, and there is no doubt that if the Speaker had permitted the House to express an opinion it would have been as emphatic on the same side. The Presidnt was at the pains of sending a special commissioner to the Island to investigate the killing of an American citizen in a Spanish prison, and so much of his report as has been made public goes to show that the charges of gross inhumanity so frequently brought against the Spanish civil and military administration in the Island are only too well sustained. The new Minister to Madrid has not yet started on his mission. In the five months of the McKinley administration not a single step has been taken toward ending the horrors of a war that has now been waged with ever increasing ferocity for two and a half years. The reports of our consular officials in Cuba are still withheld from the public on the pitiful plea, presumably, that those officers would be exposed to the rage of Spanish mobs if their official statements were made public; yet no ship of war has been sent to Cuban waters to afford to tnem and to other Americans the protection to which they were entitled.

In the meantime, the ghastly methods which General Weyler calls war have been relentlessly pursued. Unable to conquer the insurgent forces in the field he has sought by the aid of murder, famine and disease to destroy the non-combatant population, and so to bring to terms the leaders of the revolution against whom he has proved himself powerless in any real warfare. His proclamations announcing the pacification of the Western provinces have been proved to be official lies. A month ago this remarkable general took command in person of forty battalions with which, as he declared, he had surrounded the forces of the rebel Gomez, and he announced the speedy end of the rebllion. Gomez replied by a swift movement to the west and a bold proclamation of his invasion of the province of Havana, with the main army of the revolution, which promptly brought the remarkable Weyler back to Havana. Such an ignominious failure as this would be enough to end the military pretensions of any but a Spanish general, but Weyler seems to be the best that Spain has to offer.

We are a people much addicted to sympathizing with the afflicted, who are sufficiently remote from us. We enjoy denunciations of British mal-administration in India and send shiploads of provisions for the relief of the famine-stricken Hindoos. We proudly display our sympathies for rebellious Cretans, and we aimost went into convulsions over the tales of missionaries about the outrages perpetrated in Armenia. Yet for more than two years we have looked with patience on the bloody deeds that have been done in an island not a hundred miles from our own shores without discovering that the fighting Cuban is quite as worthy of sympathy as the cowardly Armenian, or that the Spaniard can turn a fair land into a shambles as cruelly as the Turk ever could. In fact we have not yet made the official discovery thatthere is any war in Cuba, and the Cubans will probably work out their own salvation without any assistance or sympathy from our government.

CONFIDENTIAL REPORTS ON TEACHERS.

During this week we have been treated to a rather startling revelation of some of the methods by which our small army of teachers in the public schools is administered. It seems that the principles of the several schools are required to submit to the Superintendent semi-annual reports of the conduct and efficiency of the individual teachers under their charge. These reports are supposed to be confidential in their nature and are furnished for the guidance of the Superintendent in making assignments of the teachers to duty for which they may seem to be best qualified. But the Superintendent, unmindful of the supposed confidential character of the reports or of the inability of politicians of the caliber of the ordinary school director to respect a confidence reposed in them, has been in the habit of furnishing copies of these reports to the members of the Board of Education. When the exigencies of the small politics by which our public schools are governed required that vacancies on the teachers' roll should be made in order that they might be filled by the appointment of favored friends of the small politicians, it was discovered by some astute teacher that these reports furnished, or could be made to furnish, the levers by which those teachers who were without friends among the gentlemen of "the push" could be dislodged from their positions. All of the teachers, to be sure, are supposed to be protected by law from the danger of removal or discharge except for good cause, and there is not, at first sight, any reason apparent for looking for anything but just and fair reports from the principals of the schools, and on such reports the Superintendent and the school directors could not easily base unjust and partisan proceedings against teachers. But unfortunately many of the teachers highest in authority owe their original appointments and their present positions to considerations which have no relation whatever to their fitness and capacity to fill them. They are just as much the creatures of the "boss" under whose patronage they thrive as are the school directors themselves. And, though the law protects them from arbitrary dismissal at the will of the "boss" or the agents of the boss who made them, there is still vested in the members of the Board of Education a power to grant or withhold favors, as in the matter of good or bad assignments, leaves of absence and the like, which gives to the members some measure of control over the actions, and, as events seem to indicate, over the opinions of some of the principals. At any rate, when there was a pressure for vacancies on the roll of teachers there was no lack of unfavorable opinions expressed in the reports of some principals on the efficiency of such of their subordinates as were marked out for decapitation, and the solid ring of the Board of Education proceeded to make out a list of twenty-five of the proscribed, with these reports as a basis for their action. That some, at least, of the reports are unjust and probably manufactured to order is shown by the fact that they are flatly contradicted by the tenor of other reports made only six months before by the same principals in the cases of the same teachers. Some of the reports as printed—the "confidential" character of all of them being, apparently, ignored—show that they are colored by personal animus rather than by any sense of duty. The result has been to sow dissension in the corps of teachers, to arouse in subordinates suspicion of the honesty of their superiors, and to demonstrate again that the education of the children of San Francisco is largely in the hands of persons whose chief, if not only qualification for that duty lies in the fact that they are familiar with the ammoniacal flavor of the livery stable from which our good citizens are content to be governed.

IMPERIAL FEDERATION.

Since the great day of the Victorian jubilee there has been a very noticeable cooling off of the enthusiasm of the British colonials for the idea of a federation of the British Empire. At the time of the great gathering which London saw last month the presence of the Prime Ministers of all the self-governing colonies of Britain and the parade of representative detachments of the armed forces of every dependency of the Crown naturally tended to raise an enthusiastic belief in the feasibility of the task of unifying the Empire, and this belief was encouraged by the public utterances and printed statements of some of the colonial representatives. It will be remembered that the Prime Minister of the Cape Colony rather effusively announced that the people of that colony would present to the British navy a battle-ship, to be built and equipped at their own expense, as their contribution toward the defense of the Empire. This declaration was hailed with joy by all loyal Britons, and the Admiralty accepted the welcome donation with fervent expressions of gratitude in advance of delivery. Since then the people of the Cape Colony have been heard from, and it is quite apparent that they have no intention of honoring their Premier's draft on their provincial purse. Their loyalty seems to reside in their mouths, perhaps in their hearts, but it does not extend to their pockets.

The colonial premiers have been extensively feted and dined since their arrival in England, and they have been profuse in their expressions of devotion to the Crown; but all attempts to get from them a public expression of opinion on the many serious questions for the solution of which federation must wait have failed. They are, perhaps, so lofty in their sentiments that they cannot descend to the consideration of mere practicalities. Or, perhaps, they are prudently holding off their interrogators till they can get home and learn what their constituents think and say on these questions.

Of all the colonies Canada alone has offered something practical and tangible for the consideration of Her Majesty's Ministers in the preferential tariff which was offered to the mother country by the Dominion Parliament at its last session. There is a reason why the Canadians should be, more than any other colonials, anxious for a closer tie with the mother country, and the reason is found in the fact that Canada alone, of all the dependencies of Great Britain, dwells in the shadow of a great power. Many Canadians, indeed, believe with Professor Goldwin Smith that the natural fate of Canada is to become an integral part of the American Republic, but this idea has always been abhorrent to the governing class of the Dominion. This class may see an additional safeguard from such absorption in becoming more truly an integral part of a real British Empire with a voice in an imperial legislature. But this consideration affects none of the other groups of colonies. The South African dependencies, as well as the Australians, feel safe in their freedom from overshadowing nighbors so long as the United Kingdom can maintain its command of the seas, a supremacy which assures them protection, while they have to contribute nothing to maintain it. There are at present racial differences in South Africa sufficient to prevent any local federation, and every attempt to federate the Australian colonies has been abortive. If these colonies, whose boundaries are mere arbitrary political lines, cannot combine among themselves it is hardly possible that they can be induced to enter the world-wide federation which seemed possible in the enthusiasm of the jubilee week. It may be that the day for imperial federation has not yet come, but it now seems more probable that that day is gone forever.

FIRST MOVE FOR A NEW CHARTER.

At the request of the Citizens' Charter Association, Mayor Phelan has appointed a committee of a hundred citizens to take the necessary steps for choosing a Board of Freeholders at a charter election, and to discuss the questions as to what provisions will be desirable in a new municipal charter. Such a body of citizens ought to be, and doubtless is, fairly representative of San Francisco, and their deliberations ought to bring out a general discussion of the advantages and disadvantages of different plans of municipal government that have been presented from time to time in the public prints. The real purpose to be kept in view is to ensure the draft of an instrument which, when submitted to the voters, will meet their approval, and this, we believe, can be accomplished by giving full publicity to the discussions of the committee and of the Board of Freeholders. This time let us try to find out, before the election, what the people want. Previous efforts have merely resulted in showing, after the election, what the people did not want—valuable information, no doubt, but too costly. If all good citizens who want good government for our city will help the Mayor's committee, and if the Board of Freeholders will be guided by the result of the committee's labors we can look forward confidently to the ratification of a new charter.

Australia, which has led in many socialistic experiments made by the State, is now considering the question of State physic. The President of the Queensland Medical Association proposes that the country be divided into medical districts, under doctors paid by the State, to look after all the inhabitants, and that the money for the purpose be raised by a poll tax of $2 per year. This would enable the State to pay $1,500 for the lowest medical salaries. A New South Wales labor league has declared that "the practice of medicine should be a national service."

Naval experts at Kiel are now testing the practical uses of dragon-shaped airships, which may be put on board vessels for use in naval engagements and in reconnoitring. Some of the balloons rose 5,500 feet, remaining fastened to the deck of torpedo-boats which were steaming eighteen knots an hour, enabling the aeronauts to make valuable observations of the stations of vessels at a great distance. The observations made were communicated by telegraph or telephone from the balloons to persons on the decks of the vessels below.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

Of the men who started north after gold or news not one was better equipped than John McGilvary, who goes to the Klondyke for the New York "Herald." Not content with an ordinary journalist, the editor of the "Herald" demanded a man who would unite the virtues of style and mining knowledge. John McGilvary has considerable skill in the reportorial way, and in addition took a mining course at Berkeley, has been superintendent of a mine, has a father in the employ of the London Exploration Company and a brother, one of the most successful experts on the coast. Besides, he is known favorably to Louis Janin and Ham Smith, who expert for the Rothschilds. They all recommended him, and McGilvary was given unlimited credit for preparations and told to go north. He takes with him a first-class photographer and apparel enough to keep him warm through several winters. The outfit of this gentleman being something out of the ordinary, is worth detailing. First a heavy suit of flannels, then a suit of chamois skin; next, an ordinary suit of heavy tweeds; a skin suit with fur inside, and over that an exterior covering. Thus in working hours Mr. McGilvary expects to keep out of the cold. At night he will sleep in a big sack made of heavy woolen blankets, enclosed in skins and oilcloth. A heavy sealskin cap, with flaps for ears and throat, will protect his head and face. He has also paper blankets, provisions in plenty and all sorts of appliances, and if he can get them all through the Chilcoot may bid the regions of the Arctic defiance. The truth is that it will be impossible to get all the stuff that went north by the Excelsior up to Dawson ere the river freezes. The equipment of barges on the Yukon is quite inadequate to carry the immense quantity of supplies that awaits transportation at St. Michaels. Of course the A. C. Co. will do all it knows to send the stuff to destination, but its means are definite and can accommodate but a fixed amount. It is not credible, however, that there will be a famine at Dawson, inasmuch as most of the adventurers have enough to keep the wolf from the doors. I am told that a company of Humboldt men are arranging to procure a string of the trained mules which supply transportation facilities in the northern mountains of California. These are sure-footed and powerful and carry an enormous load, if it be properly packed. The perils of the Chilcoot I believe they could surmount at a rate to discount the efforts of dog sleds and Indians.

Though one hears little but Klondyke talked up town and down, it must be remembered that our own output of gold here in California is the greatest in the country. In spite of Arctic excitements the mother lode continues to be the scene of unprecedented activity. Twenty big mines are in operation within a radius of five miles of the Rawhide, and there must be at least one hundred small ones. Jamestown bids fair to be one of the largest and most prosperous of the interior towns, and it resounds with the echo of hammer and chisel, for houses are going up everywhere. I am told that extensive discoveries of ore have recently been made in the Rawhide, and as a consequence Captain Nevils and his associates are kept busy looking for new outlets for their capital. There is no longer a word about selling the property, which is now paying magnificently.

The "Examiner," in its Thursday's issue was pleased to infer that the twenty-five thousand people who assembled at Mission street wharf Wednesday afternoon to witness the departure of the Excelsior were there for the purpose of wishing Godspeed to the "Monarch's" expedition. This may be true, or again it may not. It may, perhaps, not be out of place to note that the "Examiner" has not got a monopoly of Klondyke expeditions. The "Call" and "Chronicle" are both in the ring, and while the "Monarch" has been sounding its horn to the four winds of heaven Harry Hunt of the "Chronicle" has been and is even now pushing his way through the snow drifts somewhere about Sixty Mile and will be one of the first journalists "upon the spot." Two other "Chronicle" men are following hard upon the heels of Mr. Hunt, and and ought to reach Dawson by the time the "Examiner" expedition is struggling up into the Chilcoot. For once the "Monarch" must admit that both of its rivals are in ahead of it. The "Chronicle" does not choose to call its staff of news gatherers an expedition, since the men will work independently of one another. At Dawson City, which of course will be their headquarters, they will be sent out in to the country in every direction, according as reports of finds and new strikes come in. All of the men sent thus far by the local dailies are expert news writers, and what with the rivalry and competition that will be developed in their midst, San Francisco can expect to be well supplied with news from the north—always provided the mails get through. May be this is where the "Examiner" will get in its execution. Its men are provided with unlimited credit and are authorized to hire couriers to convey their letters written en route back to Juneau.

I am told by a gentleman who might be supposed to know that no less vigorous a citizen that Claus Spreckels himself has taken control of the destinies of "The Call." The vigorous Sugar King, during the absence of his son, John D., in Washington, objected to certain features of the paper and to its manner of handling fights, so he sent for the editors and breathed something of his own undaunted spirit into them. Now he is giving orders as to policy, and the paper already begins to feel the impetus. In future when "The Call" takes an attitude it will be no use attempting to defeat it—it's there for good and all.

The eruption in the Board of Education is merely the occurrence of the expected. Sooner or later the gallant gentlemen who follow the lead of Dr. Ragan and Sam Rainey were certain to make places for their friends, though it must be admitted they have gone about it in rather a shabby manner. It is not generally known that the Solid Eight and the Solid Nine have taken to meeting in Mr. Devaney's bicycle establishment out on Central avenue. The lively wheelman had an idea that the secret consultations of the city fathers could be accomplished there without interference from journalists is no uncommon thing for the two bodies to be in session together, and Sam Rainey is generally at hand to give them the benefit of his experience. It was at one of these sessions that the idea of dispensing with the services of discredited teachers was thought of and effected, with the compliance of Superintendent Webster, who does not show himself a man of particular strength of character. I am inclined to think, however, that the consequence of this experiment will deter further effort in that direction. It is dangerous work attempting to interfere with ladies in office, and the cortege of objectors who made their appearance at the City Hall after the "Examiner's" publication convinced the Board of that.

For the first time in his life Sam Rainey is really troubled. That the pardon of burglar Smith was procured by him from the Governor, is thoroughly understood. He has done everything to mitigate the newspaper sensation that naturally followed the announcement of his high handed action, expostulated with the "Bulletin" and the "Call" people to no avail. There is no question of the facts of the case. They are obvious. At the demand of a corrupt boss the Governor has turned out upon this community a thief who had plundered the home of his late opponent in the gubernatorial fight. It was a blackguard crime and properly punished. Common decency might have persuaded Budd to follow the regular course of procedure in pardon cases, but his cunning seemed to have deserted him for once and he acted without skill or intelligence. The Wave has commented freely and accurately upon the character and conduct of Governor Budd. This latest demonstration of his disregard for decency need surprise no one, for it is in accord with his previous expressions.

At a meeting of the Solid Educational Nine at the Devaney Cyclery, Mr. Rainey, who presided, said: "Gents, there's a deal of book theorizin' in this department that I think is tommy rot. Let's have less of the stuff they call literatoor and more real practical larnin' that the boys and girls can use election times. What do all these growin' youngsters know about primaries or ballots. There's where education comes in. Yes, sir." Mr. Rainey's remarks were received with vociferous applause.

Between the Klondyke excitement and the rise of grain there has disappeared beneath the political horizon a comet named Bryan. It was not a very important apparition, and quite the reverse of celestial, but its tail figured broadly across the sky and to the ignorant seemed a portent. However, like the price of silver, it has gone under and may be heard in Lincoln, Nebraska, where it was first observed. Tidings will be thankfully received by the Silver Committee, which imagined the comet a fixed star. Apropos of grain is it not curious that as the one rises in value the other falls in price, quite obliterating the connection which the apostles of white metal affected to find between them. You remember he declared it a fixed commercial law that as long as silver was up grain was high, that when silver fell grain went to the dogs.

We are to have a new club, the San Francisco Club, and it will occupy the top floor of the Spreckels Building. There are to be one hundred charter members, with Adolph Spreckels as President, Harry Gray as Secretary and Sam Leake as Manager. The membership list is nearly completed. The special raison d'etre of the San Francisco Club I do not know, but it will doubtless develop a metier connected with politics.

It is deep satisfaction to know that the millions of the late Colonel Crocker are in safe and strong hands. Charles Green and Henry Scott are both competent business men, who may be trusted to administer the property with the utmost sagacity. Both are gifted to an unusual degree with executive ability and have made a success of the various important institutions in whose management they have taken a hand. Mr. Scott is more of a public man than Mr. Green, who has spent his life in the services of the Crockers. Both in handling the estate's affairs and in dealing with the present interests of Colonel Crocker, he has shown first rate capacity and has got results without any trumpeting or pleading.

The Midsummer Jinks is now a thing of the past. Care has been buried with due solemnity, and his death subscequently celebrated with that particular degree of festivity which only the gentlemen of the Owl Club know how to induce. The club is back in its old quarters again talking it all over and congratulating itself upon the successful outcome of its committee's efforts. It has been said that the grove never looked so delightful as it did last Saturday evening when the solemn dummy of the gang announced that the ceremonies were about to begin. Nearly a thousand lanterns depended from the overspreading branches of the redwoods, while three full orchestras discoursed the Faust music which had been selected as the accompaniment of the burial rites. It has been whispered that the High Jinks dragged the least little bit in the world. No one, however, has ought but praise for the Low Jinks, which went off with tremendous eclat, the ballet being applauded to the echo. A rumor has gone the rounds of the club, and has elated no little excitement in its circles, to the effect that one of the wealthy members—a well-known politician, by the way—has come forward with an offer to buy the grove outright and donate it to the club.

The wife of the Washington correspondent of a San Francisco paper being about to take advantage of the reduced railroad rates to visit California, her husband bethought himself as to whose hands he would entrust her, she being young and pretty. So he wrote a letter to a handsome young clergyman, bespeaking his gentle ministrations. "I would have put her in the care of some of the newspaper fellows," he wrote, "but I know them too well!" And this in the town which produced a Brown!

BOSWELL JR.

CHIEF LEES AT HIS DESK

BENJAMIN F. BOHEN, CAPTAIN OF DETECTIVES

THE "UPPER OFFICE" AT WORK

Detectives Who Lack the Traditional "Steel Blue, Penetrating" Eye.

There are wheels and springs, cogs, levers and eccentrics, in the running of a big city, just as there are in the running of a big engine. But much of the machinery is below the surface, and one is not aware of its existence, or at least is not adequately appreciative of it until one is personally affected — till one sets it in motion, as it were, by dropping a nickel in the slot. You drop a nickel, for instance, when your house is on fire, and that starts the wheels and cogs of the fire department moving, for your especial benefit, or again, your house is robbed, or a friend of yours (perhaps even yourself) is manhandled or misused by some kind of criminal, footpad, burglar, or otherwise, you drop a nickel in the appropriate slot, and straightway it starts in motion that surprising amount of complicated machinery known as the "Upper Office."

It is more interesting to watch the evolutions of upper office machinery than it is to look at the workings of the most intricate and powerful dynamo ever invented. The upper office is the headquarters of the Police and Detective systems, where Chief Lees and Captain Bohen are on duty like the engineer and fireman of a huge engine, their eyes upon the dials that indicate flux and reflux of the great city's crime-pressure, and their hands upon the throttles that check and retard its progress.

In order to see the engine at its work we will consider a typical case. Let us suppose that a crime has been committed. We will suppose a murder, because a "homicide case" is the most important kind of case in the estimation of the office, and the kind that arouses the most interest and attention. Besides, it will do as well as any from an illustrative point of view, as the preliminary moves of the machinery are much the same in every case. We will assume that on Monday of this week you found the body of a murdered woman lying on the floor of her cottage in one of the sparsely-built neighborhoods out beyond the Park. The first thing you do is to report this matter to the upper office—to Chief of Police Lees. This upper office is in the City Hall, on the lower floor, easily accessible, and open day and night. At the railing you announce the bloody business upon which you have come. You are in the outside office now, and as soon as the clerk knows your matter, he turns you over to the "desk sergeant." You say your little say over again to this desk sergeant, and he asks you question after question until you think he will never tire, and when all is over and your information has been pumped from you till you are dry as a pocket, you find that a stenographer has taken it all down in minutest detail.

Then the desk sergeant asks you to come along with him, and takes you and your statement into the inner office — the sanctissimum sanctorum — where Captain Lees sits watching over the city's welfare. Captain, or as he is to be called, Chief Lees, reads over the statement carefully, and perhaps asks you a few more questions. Your surprises will probably begin about here. You have thought, perhaps, that there was no more information left in you—that your case had been viewed in every possible light, but it is quite on the cards that the Chief will put to you one or two questions as penetrating and keen as lancets, that will perhaps disentangle the whole business in a twinkling, or at least give you some tangible, definite idea upon which to work.

After this, a little dramatic effect. The Chief rings his bell, and asks which one of the detectives is outside. Now, there are fifteen of these detectives in attendance upon the upper office. They have begun their respective careers as ordinary patrolmen, were moved up a grade to become corporals, another grade to become sergeants, and still another grade to become detectives. They are not "sleuths" at all. It is rather disappointing, but they are not "sleuths." They have not got "steel blue penetrating" eyes, nor "nervous, intent manners," nor even "lithe, wiry frames." You would pass them a dozen times in a crowd and not know the difference; if you did remark anything extraordinary about them they would not be good detectives, of course. Worst of all, however (it is one more idol shattered, one more illusion vanished, one more childish hope dashed earthwards) worst of all, they do not carry — but I say they—do—not—carry—revolvers! Think of that, now! Detectives—San Francisco detectives—that do not carry revolvers! I confess myself that I cannot very well understand it. Perhaps it is the fault of our criminals—perhaps they are so degenerate and effete that a revolver is superfluous. But that can hardly be. Somewhere there is something wrong. What does the detective do, I wonder, when "the infuriated man, driven to bay at last, turns savagely upon his relentless pursuer, and, with knife drawn, leaps upon him with a tiger-like bound"? By all signs and tokens he should "find himself looking down the mouth of a self-cocker." I fancy that even he would be disappointed if he did not. The absence of this self-cocker must ruin the effect of the whole scene.

Well, anyhow, these detectives do not carry revolvers. They are merely temperate, industrious men, somewhat tenacious and carefully trained in their line of business. One of these the Chief now calls into the office, and for a third time the story of the murder is re-told. In calling for this particular detective the Chief is guided entirely by his estimate of the man's abilities. Some detectives are better for a burglary case, some for a highway robbery, some for a murder, or as the upper office chooses to call it, "a homicide case." When the detective has all the points of the matter in mind, the Chief says to him:

"You'd better go out there and have a look around."

The detective "at once repairs to the scene of the crime." He is very lucky if he gets out there before the room has been touched or the body moved. He has his "look around." No matter what the case may be, or how it may develop later, there are three preliminary steps that the detective invariably takes — three things that, first of all, he tries to ascertain. The first is to find the weapon, the second is to find a motive, and the third is to find the person who was last seen with the victim. More depends on the nature of the weapon used than you would at first suppose. For instance, a revolver or dirk would indicate (I say indicate, not prove) premeditation—an axe, or chair-back, or table-leg, sudden, uncontrollable passion. Again, the knife and pistol are the weapons of the habitual criminal; the hatchet and the club are the reverse. (One hastens to add that this is mere indication—supposition—not proof.) Nothing need be said here about motives — everyone can understand their importance—but a great deal depends on the last person who was seen in the victim's company. Of course the last person, literally the last person actually in the victim's company before the firing of the shot was the murderer. It could be none else. So the detective must get as close to this "last person" as may be. He begins by finding out who was "the last person" seen with the victim. If he is not the person wanted, he is very apt to know a good deal about the case anyhow. He was perhaps next to the last person seen with the victim. So, when the detective gets him, even if he is not the murderer, he is getting pretty close to his game. There is only one man, then, that stands between him and the murderer himself.

THE UPPER OFFICE, WHERE THE DETECTIVES COMPARE NOTES

Beyond this point the routine work ceases and the work shapes itself according to the nature of the case. But there are miscellaneous little points that are worthy of notice. They happen constantly. For instance, there are two characters that are almost sure to figure in every murder case. One is the Landlady, the other the Railway Conductor. Both of them are liable to come on in the same case. It is rather fortunate that this should be so, as an old detective once told me that the most observing people in the world were women, little girls, and railway conductors, and the latter are not only observing of faces, but (since they live, as my detective friend says, with their watches in their hands) they can remember to within five minutes as to just what particular time they observed the face in question.

Another point is that some detectives would rather have for identification purposes a good description of a criminal, than a photograph of him. I cannot make out very clearly just why this should be so, but I should imagine that a man carries about with him a certain distinct impression—a sort of symbol of his personality—and that, while he could easily change the expression of his face, either by shaving or allowing his beard to grow, he could not very well get rid of his personality—could not influence the impression he produces upon the beholder. Perhaps it is for this reason that a little girl is such a good hand at identification and observation. She is more sensitive to impression than an older person—a veritable sensitized plate, as one might say. You remember, it is said that dogs and children know a villain by instinct.

And I gathered from my detective friend that a good detective must get, as it were, an intuitive, instinctive idea of the man whom he wants—an idea, an impression, (to repeat the same word), that is quite independent of his face or his clothes, which can easily be changed.

The ideal detective would be one who could go into a ten-cent lodging house, let us say, and run his hands over the bodies of the hundreds of sleeping inmates, almost in the dark, until he reaches a certain one, and then, suddenly, almost without knowing why, stop short, get a good grip of the fellow's wrists, and then, as he wakes, be able, with some certainty, to say:

"I want you!"

DISAFFECTION IN INDIA

Disturbances Proceed From British Enforcement of Sanitary Laws.

The observant man is well aware that misfortunes never come singly to the individual, and it seems to be part of the divine law that nations and countries should be similarly afflicted. As if the deaths and suffering caused to the natives of India by plague and famine were not scourge enough, the eastern side of Hindostan has been visited by an earthquake of unprecedented severity, doing immense damage to the city of Calcutta and bringing death and destruction to many parts of Northern Bengal. Simultaneously with the employment of these disastrous forces of nature a wave of discontent and sedition broke over the country, leading to riots in Calcutta and the assassination at Poona, in the province of Bombay, of officers engaged in sanitary work for minimizing the ravages of the plague. In many quarters the opinion exists that some want of judgment was shown by the authorities in employing British troops for the enforcement of the preventive measures prescribed by the sanitary laws and regulations, so excellent an authority as Sir Lepel Griffin, one of the most competent and distinguished administrators ever known in India, that land of able civilian officers, being amongst those who have condemned the Government in this respect.

Had this work been delegated to native troops and police it is probable the fierce dislike of the Hindoos to any interference with their domestic life and habits by Europeans would not have been called forth, as their countrymen would most likely have succeeded in carrying out the necessary but obnoxious regulations in a manner calculated to keep down, instead of foment, their unreasoning passions and religious fanaticism, which latter is invariably at the bottom of all difficulty in controlling Oriental peoples. There seems to be very little doubt that much mischief arises from the seditious tone generally adopted by the native press. Most of the papers are conducted by unprincipled men of no position, possessed of a superficial education, and who trade upon the weaknesses of their ignorant countrymen, on the one hand terrorizing them with the pen of the blackmailer, and on the other influencing them to resist all constituted authority. Where a section of the press in a country mainly populated by the densely ignorant prostitutes its liberty by employing treasonable methods, it is a duty of the Government to step in and put a stop to the evil. Experience has shown that the rulers of India have no other course open to them than to strike quickly and effectively whenever treason has shown its head. That the effects of the present famine and its attendant evils be apparent in the future socia lpolicybgkqjfwyp Indian Government, as well as upon the extension of public utilities, such as irrigation works, canals, railways and roads there is little reason to doubt. One of such effects will probably be to check the growth of that liberality in political tendencies, which has been the feature of the last decade or so in that great Eeastern empire.

The shipments of gold from Western Australia during the first half of the current year amounted to 265,314 ounces, as against 114,324 ounces for the same period of 1896, and 281,263 ounces for the whole of that year.

'Commenteth at Length Upon Letters Received.

Last Tuesday afternoon I went around to my favorite Chinese restaurant—the one on the top floor, of the See Yup silk-merchant's, that overlooks the Plaza. I have lately contracted the habit of betaking myself thitherward for an afternoon cup of tea and a quiet half hour with a book and a cigar. It ought to be cigarettes, but I've promised a girl that——I mean that it's very charming in this golden balcony, tea is never so delicious as it is here, and your book never so interesting, and your cigar—cigar, I say, mark you—never so delicious. I like to go this place alone, for I feel it is mine by right of discovery, but on Tuesday last I caromed against Leander at the street corner. He was in Chinatown for Heaven knows what purpose. Of course I had to take him along.

"I say, Just," he remarked, as he sat down on a teak wood stool and plucked up his trousers at the knee; "I say, old man, this is completely out of sight. Say, Just, wouldn't this be a great place to bring the One Particular Girl to?"

I said something or other here.

Leander grinned with bland incredulity, then added: "Would it be good form, now?" Then suddenly: "Apropos of that, Just, you and your good form and your bad form and your confounded 'opinions' have brought me into trouble."

"Oh, get out!"

"I won't—they have!"

"I've been getting letters."

"Well?"

"From girls—girls that I don't know—who——"

"Well, there's the police, you know. The law will protect you."

"Oh, shut up! Wait till I finish. I've been getting letters from girls, and they—and they—well, they say things."

"It's a habit girls have. What do they say?"

"Here," said Leander, gravely unfolding a sheet, "is one of them. Read it."

I took the letter in his hands.

"Hum!" said I; "unglazed paper, and ruled at that! Mph! Reeks of sachet, too!"

"Oh, never mind that; it's what she says."

"Mr. Leander—Dear Sir: I read with great attention your strictures upon the young ladies of San Francisco Society ('spells it with a big S,' I commented) and I wish to take this opportunity of refuting and denying your unmanly ('say, that's rough!') and malicious charges. The young ladies of this city," I continued, "are as well bred and refined as any of the world, and though I have been in Society for over ten years ('that's a giveaway!' I cried, and, I'm afraid, I cackled) and I have never seen the slightest approach to any of the practices ('practices! Good Lord!') to which you are pleased to allude with such shameful publicity ('Oh, well, she's a chaperone—you can see that with one hand tied behind you.') In closing, all I can say is that you and your frivolous friend——"

"That's you, Just!" exclaimed Leander, grimly.

"——must have been associated with a very peculiar ('peculiar, underscored') kind of young women. You should not, I scarcely need remind you, judge all other ladies according to their own somewhat limited experiences." No signature.

"Well!" said Leander.

"Well!" said I.

"What did you get me into this thing for?" complained Leander; "do you think I like getting that kind of a letter?"

"No," said I, "I shouldn't think you would."

"Well, then, what the devil——"

Leander's voice rose to a shrill wail.

"Leander, there's nothing heroic about you. You are not willing to suffer in a good cause. You want to do all the hitting, and when someone—someone who's been ten years in society—hits back, you squeal. Shame on you! Now, I, too, have received a letter," said I, proudly; "in fact, several of them on this same subject."

"You have?" cried Leander, blankly; "let's hear 'em."

"No, one will do; they're much alike."

"Much like mine?"

"Much unlike," I returned, loftily. "Observe now" (I held the letter towards him) "pale blue paper, rather heavy, and suggestive of parchment—very faint odor of heliotrope—and, you see, she had a monogram, because, you notice, she has cut it out to concea her identity."

"Let's hear what she has to say."

"Dear Mr. Sturgis—" I read.

"That's better than Mr. Leander—Dear Sir," moaned Leander.

"I should say so," said I, very proudly. "Dear Mr. Sturgis: I read your article last Saturday on 'Girls,' and I think if more people had the sense to write similar articles, it might do the San Francisco girl some good."

"Huh!" said I, breaking off; "your girl said it was an unmanly and malicious charge."

"She wasn't young, I'll bet a hat," grumbled Leander; "and her paper was ruled—go on."

I went on: "——some good, and open their eyes to what men really think of them——"

"But we think very well of them," cried Leander; "that's just why we deplore their—their— vagaries."

"——they think it's funny and that the men laugh, but indeed they don't. I am one of the girls that are 'out,' but believe me, we are not all that way."

"Hear! Hear!" cried Leander, pounding with his stick.

"——and those of us that have——"

"She will use 'that' for 'who;' but never mind."

"——that have some sense of refinement feel just as the men do. Although I do not sign my name, I know you and you know me quite well."

"There!" said I, putting back the letter; "what do you say to that?"

"Corking fine little girl," commented Leander; "wish she'd written to me. May be, though, she comes from Oakland."

"No; she bought this paper at Robertson's. stamped on the flap of the envelope."

Leander drank off the rest of his tea, and chewed a pickled watermelon rind thoughtfully. Then:

"Just," said he, "who's to blame?"

"Who's to blame for what?"

"Who's to blame for the whole blooming show. Why do the girls smoke cigarettes and drink cocktails on the sly, and why do men come to functions drunk?"

"Leander, this brutal frankness——"

"Well, call it the vagaries of the younger set, if you like. Are the men at fault, or the girls, or is it the chaperones, or is it—by Jove, we have never thought of that!—is it the girls' mothers?"

"There's one thing," said I, "that's certain; the girls wouldn't smoke if they didn't think the men found it amusing."

"But that's just it," cried Leander. "The men don't. The girls don't know—they don't believe that the very men who encourage them to smoke have a sort of secret contempt for them after all."

"But they say they like a girl better because she's daring and chic and independent of convention. They call her fin-de-siecle and all that."

"Yes, that's what they tell the girl. But amongst ourselves, now, did you ever, in all your life, hear one man tell another that he liked to see a girl smoke, or that he liked her better because she knew how to handle a cigarette?"

I reflected. I tried to remember one—I am still trying.

"No, you never did, and more than that, the girls only know what the man says to them. He says, 'Oh, go on; what's a cigarette? Pshaw! I like to see a girl do everything a man does. I like to see a girl up to date.' But we—you and I and the rest of the fellows—know what these same men say of such girls among ourselves. They 'Hoh, yes; that little girl;' then they shrug one shoulder and smile a bit out of one side of their mouth (you know the meaning of that!); 'yes, that little girl,' they say, 'she's gay all right. You can have the hell of a good time with her.' I wonder what the girl would say if she could see and hear him? I wonder if she'd think it was so damned funny to smoke a cigarette then? Admit that I'm right now. Say, ain't I right?"

"Well, I guess you are, Leander. But now look here: You say the girls would stop smoking if they knew how the men talked about 'em?"

"Of course. Do you suppose a girl likes to smoke?"

"Well, now, listen here. These men that come to functions drunk—here's a question for you—do the girls think less of them for it? How do the girls talk about them when they are among themselves?"

"That's a point to be considered," said Leander, as we rose to go.

JUSTIN STURGIS.

DIVORCE OR NOT

Eminent Hands Who Think the Separation of Husband and Wife Desecration.

Mr. Marion Crawford has struck a note in his "Rose of Yesterday," that has been reaching rather widely of late. If marriage is the most important thing in life, certainly then divorce is the next in importance, and it is upon this chord of "divorce"—a disonant chord, of course—that Mr. Crawford has been harping, and all manner of people have listened and have answered so that the whole question has been momentarily revived, the question as to the desirability of divorce in the first place and the comparative ease with which it can be obtained in the second.

The main theme of Mr. Crawford's "Rose of Yesterday" is the obstinate fidelity of Helen Harmon to an insane husband, whose brutality has made their son an idiot and has also left actual scars upon her forehead. Matters are further complicated by the appearance on the scene of one Colonel Wimpole, an old-time suitor of the lady, and still her devoted lover. Harmon, the undesirable husband, is in a sanitarium, but though she loves the fatherly Colonel, Helen will not for worlds infringe upon her marriage vows: Says "That even when The Great Mistake is made, many a woman clings to the faith that made it for the sake of what might have been, in a self respect of which men do not dream. Even when she has married with little love and taken a man who has turned upon her like a brute beast, her marriage is still a bond which she cannot break, and the vow made is not void because the promise taken has been a vain lie." All of which is very noble, as any one will admit.

Women, not a few, have been commenting and talking about the book, notably and primarily Ella Wheeler Wilcox. She believes in divorce only as a very last resort, holds that wherever divorces are easily attainable morals and manners degenerate, but at the same time, says Miss Wilcox, in the little jerky maxim style she adopts, "at the same time it is greater immorality for two people to live together as man and wife after love has departed than for two people who love each other to live together with no legal tie. The latter she says is a sin against man's law and the former against God's. "Love," she concludes, "is a plant which can be fed, fertilized and nourished by proper care."

Mrs. Sherwood (the M. E. W. Sherwood, known to literature the world round) manages to slip in a rather pretty conceit while expressing her opinion. Says Mrs. Sherwood: "The 'Rose of Yesterday' is in every bride's bouquet," which certainly is very neat. Mrs. Sherwood is a "Catholique Catholiquante," and believes that Mr. Crawford would not have written the "Rose of Yesterday" had he been a Protestant. Then she goes on to assert that men and women have no right, no matter what may be their personal wrongs, so to imperil the laws of our country, the security of property, the nobility of a family name, by indulgence in what may be to us a far more agreeable arrangement than that which in a moment of fancied bliss we once assumed at the altar. "Alas!" exclaims Mrs. Sherwood, mournfully enough, "Alas! no, we took that dreadful risk of unhappiness."

So much for Mrs. Sherwood. Clara Morris now: Clara

Morris, too, waxes poetic over this much-handled rose, saying that it is but one of a very tangle and thicket of just such abandoned, slowly fading, flower-like women." It were perhaps best to use Clara's own words here, for they certainly are pungent enough: "I have tried earnestly to put myself in Helen Harmon's place and my efforts result in a slow, deadly nausea at the thought even of Harmon's physical presence, while a cold creeping horror mounts to the roots of my hair at the knowledge of the cruelty done the child. Yet with this sick horror gripping body and brain (really an admirable phase) I would say he must be allowed to return and have his chance." But her loyalty, she says very distinctly, would be to her promise and plighted troth, not to the man himself by any manner of means. But here is another view. Clara Lanza (Marquise an' 't please you), has something to say in the matter. Mme la Marquise holds that undoubtedly the author is right in condemning the wholesale putting aside of wives and husbands. "But, nevertheless," she says, "in the case presented, Helen's exagerated sense of duty partakes somewhat of the nature of weakness." (Hear! Hear!) "To have returned to her husband meant a possible repetition of the horrors she had endured, the sacrifice of her son, and the wretchedness of her love." All three would have then been sacrificed and only the brute beast of a husband considered and rewarded. The greatest good to the greatest number, says the lady, is a point that moralists frequently overlook in their laudable efforts to enforce a lesson and to present types more divine than human. Good for Clara Marquise Lanza.

Next we have Marion Harlan, who has but little to say, "believes that we should make the best of the worst." Though a Protestant herself, does nevertheless hold to the Catholic dogma about giving in marriage. Thinks divorce desirable in most extreme cases, but that re-marriage is little short of horrible crime. If two cannot dwell together in God's Holy ordinance of matrimony (so holds Marion Harland), let a formal separation relieve each of the intolerable load, but let no hope of another union that may compensate for the evils of the first influence anticipation and aggravate discontent.

Thus all these estimable, clever people. But one cannot but ask, though, if they (barring Marquise Clara) are not speekin from the outside, as it were. It is all very fine to say "be loyal to your altar vows" when one is not married, or at least married happily, and Mr. Crawford can put very noble sentiments between the lips of Helen Harmon. But one is very apt to forget that human nature is a poor thing at best, with limitations hedging it about everywhere, and most especially from above. It is all fine to sit down to one's study table and turn on the current, electric and intellectual, and moralize at length on what we should do in certain tremendous crises. We are mighty brave with our lead soldiers and pea-shooting ordinance, but it is as well to remember the beastly dirt from which we were made, after all, and reflect gravely upon how we ourselves would actually deport ourselves in actual battle and actual crises.

Helen Harmon is all very well between cloth covers and on deckel-edge paper. One is induced to believe that this knid of a rose is as rare as a flower north of the Arctic Circle.

Heavy death duties are leading to curious attempts to avoid them on the part of the British aristocracy. The Duke of Richmond and Gordon is about to disentail the Gordon estates, which give him his second title, with that object in view. The Earl of Leven and Melville asserted recently in the House of Lords that pictures valued at $17,500,000 had been sent out of England to be sold in order to free inheritances from Sir William Harcourt's crushing taxes.

JAPAN TRANSPLANTED

Practical Summer Houses a la Japonaise at Mill Valley.

We have a little of everything out here in California—a little China, a little Mexiso, a little Spain, a little France, a little Japan, and, by way of parenthesis, a little America. We hope to have a good deal of America some day, when all these nationalities become merged into one, but we are busy race-forming just now and are rather elemental as yet.

The sojourner up in Mill Valley ought not, in consequence, to be surprised to come upon a little bit of Japan tucked away in the crevices of the hills like a curio in an old stand of shelves. Somehow he is, though, and perhaps it is because that this bit of Japan is so surprisingly real, so very Japanese. Things supposedly from Japan are not always so Japanese as is Mr. Marsh's Japanese villa, or perhaps village, for there are quite a collection of houses that go climbing up and around the sides of the Mill Valley canyon, some three or four miles back from the railroad station. It is said that one of Velasquez's portraits always gives the impression of being a remarkable good likeness because it is so well done. In a like manner the aforesaid sojourner in the valley is at once sure that Mr. Marsh's place is purely, thoroughly Japanese, even though he may never have been in Japan at all.

Altogether there are some dozen—it is impossible to say cottages—little Japanese summer houses, let us call them, quite habitable and practical but designed by Japanese architects and put together by Japanese laborers, low of ceiling, spacious of interior, cool, light and airy, ideal places for a hot summer's day. From the time the outer gate is entered until you pass through it again on your way out there is nothing in the least suggestive of Western civilization to be seen—nothing but yourself and your own ungainly clothes; at least they feel ungainly upon coming out any one of these delicious little houses.

One of these is built in a tree, or rather around the trunk of a tree, some forty feet from the ground—a charming little summer house as Japanese as any of the rest of them, straw thatched, and circular in form. The tree trunk is its center-post and the branches its ceiling-piece. The place is quite practical for living purposes, as was amply demonstrated some year or so ago when a journalist and his bride spent the year of their honeymoon within it.

SAILING OF THE "EXCELSIOR"

A Dash for Polar Gold From San Francisco.

Well, she's gone, the Excelsior, this last of the Argoes, and you and I are left behind in our offices and at our desks or counters to wonder whether after all we've done the wise thing to stay or whether we have let slip the one golden opportunity of our lives. She cleared to-day at half-past two, Tuesday afternoon, and went out with the tide, while San Francisco looked into her wake and cheered her on her way. She is gone now, and with her our last chance—your last chance and mine, and it's too late now to make up our minds.

The excitement of her departure from the Mission street wharf was quite as thrilling as anything I remember to have seen, because twenty thousand people thronged about her, packed sardine fashion on the wharves, crowding upon roofs and ships and even into the rigging of near-by masts and yards. Every class and rank and grade was represented in that crowd, from girls in smart frocks who came down from Pacific avenue in their own coupes, to stevedores and city front touts, who stood about, thumbs in belt, nodding curt farewells to grubstaked "pals," who, with blanket roll and haversack huddled on the afterdeck. There was laughter and tears, sobs and smiles, shouts of encouragement and sighs of regret. Every mood played over that huge throng, every mood but that of indifference. Not a man or woman in those thousands could honestly say that they did not catch the excitement of the occasion, did not feel the thrill of the moment. One hasn't got so far beyond the primitive type after all, at least not so far but that the first touch of gold, the pure, crude, virgin metal, stirs us to a ferment of emotion, a very fever heat of cupidity and desire. If you do not believe this, suppose for a moment that the Excelsior were bound upon some business venture, even one that involved millions of dollars, do you think twenty thousand men would rush together to see her go, and drown the noise of her whistle with the clamor of their shouting? Not by any means.

There was excitement in the air that verged upon hysteria; women who trailed down the gang-plank after the last bell, red and wet as to the eyelids, awry as to bonnets, their veils still up after that last farewell kiss, were the next moment laughing at the veriest trifles and talking to anyone who would listen. And, indeed, all of us on that Mission street wharf were friends; we stood upon a common ground; as lovers of gold, we were lovers of each other; and men talked together and slapped each other's shoulders who will pass one another to-morrow on the street, their chins in the air, in most dignified and distant reserve. The thing was replete with incident. One fellow I noted who had not caught the fever. He stood near the gang-plank grinning cynically at the embarking argonauts and prophesying direst and most dreadful failure for the whole expedition.

"Huh!" says he, with fine scorn. "Huh! whad they think they're goin' to do; pick up the stuff right offun the ground, p'raps. Just in fistfulls. Huh! little ol' 'Frisco's good enough for me this while to come, I guess. I got a business in hides that's all the gol' mine I want. Huh! The Klondyke! Huh! dam-fool gold bugs! Huh!" He spat into the water to illustrate the extremity of his contempt. About half an hour later, just as the Excelsior swung clear and began to feel the water with her screw and the crowd and whistle roared in concert, and the tossing white handkerchiefs swept over the black throng of heads like whitecaps in a black squall, this same man —I stood at his elbow—turned to a friend.

"Well," says he, with a certain defiant ring in his voice, "I could a gone 'f I'd wanted to, couldn't I, hey? Couldn't I, hey?" Then, after a pause, in a gruff mumble, as if talking to himself, "An' if that fool Batty (Batty was his friend who had shipped), an' if that fool Batty comes back with a wad, I'll kick myself 'round the whole dam' lot, I will."

Did I say there was no one in that crowd who was indifferent? I was wrong; there was one man. You may not know it, but the wharves are a good place on which to sleep off your liquor, and for that reason are much affected by the drunks of the Front. Such an one was caught by the Excelsior crowd. He was reclining against a pile of boards, and the crowd had grown up around him, and he lay there oblivious to everything that was going forward. People walked over him, even stepped on him and stumbled over him. The babel of sound was a veritable thunder, and all the sign he made was an insensate lifting of an eyelid and a vacant smile. Think of it! The city thrilling from end to end with the great find, the thousands of people rushing in to say farewell to their argonauts, and this man lay there under foot, so close to the ship that he could have laid his hand upon her hull, and cared not whether she swan or sank—probably knew not why she sailed. Never has a drunken man seemed so loathly to me. One fairly quivered with a desire to kick him from the string piece of the wharf and allow to perish in the water a man so utterly out of the race as this one. Not even the courage to stow himself away—one might have forgiven that—but not so much as to look on, to wallow there under foot. Why, the veriest tough, the most worthless and vicious scapegoat on the Excelsior's passenger list, is a hero to this beast of a man.

It was strange to see how the excitement told on the people—those who were passengers and those who were left. At the very last moment one man rushed down the plank with both hands full of silver, called a friend to him, and, as he poured the money into his hat, cried, "Give this to the wife; tell her I won't want silver up there, nothin' but gold."

Another chap suddenly remembered that he owed a departing friend a dollar, and fairly lathered himself in his exertion to reach the rail and square himself. Another man, a huge, fat fellow, who knew more people than any man I ever saw, left a little brother behind. The fat man, from the deck of the boat, was trying to talk and joke with everybody at once, but the little brother, with the tears running down his face, never took his eyes from him. The fat man never looked toward his little brother, and his face never uncreased itself from its jovial grin, but I was mighty glad to see that every now and then, on the most trivial pretext, he would come running down the plank, his huge stomach shaking in front of him, and call the little brother to him, and the two would exchange a couple of words and another hand-grip. "George," he would say, "don't forget about them insurance papers—and—and—well, good-bye again, old man."

And in another moment, after an interval of shouting and chaffing, would be back again on some equally palpable excuse. The little brother—he was perhaps fifteen —never said a word, but he wasn't ashamed to let the whole crowd see the tears running down his cheeks.

There was another man, an old man, however, upon whom the tremendous excitement—for it was all of that —acted like heady wine (perhaps he was weak-minded, anyways—probably he was). At any rate, just when the cheering was loudest, this old man completely lost control of himself and found occasion to leap into a buggy, swinging his hat violently, and thunder, "Lookout for your souls, for the kingdom of Christ is coming. Look-out for your souls, I say."

For any one accustomed to the deliberate and ponderous movement of a liner getting under way, the actual departure of the Excelsior was abrupt in the extreme, almost flippant. One instant the gang-plank was drawn in; the next, ten feet of water gaped between wharf and ship, and the next the screw was churning up the waters of the bay.

She was off at last; off hardly before we knew it; off to those Arctic treasure fields, with so many hopes and fears and plans and expectations, and there in her stern and on the afterdecks were the men—plenty of them men whom we knew—going out and up to that bleak, stricken, gray country away up there on the curve of world, on the shoulder of the globe, over so many miles of trembling water and so many leagues of snow and ice, to wrestle with the reluctant, frozen ground, fighting it, as one might say, grappling it with pick and shovel, tearing the heart out of it, the vitals out of it. Some of these men will find a fortune along the Yukon. That is sure; and some of them will be killed there. That is also sure. So that, taking it by and large, there is a splendid uncertainty about the whole affair that invests it with a quality of dignity like a charge of cavalry or a dash for the pole, and as the Excelsior's whistle roared and the water began to talk under her foreport, and her flags stood out to the wind, and the screw rumbled in a vortex of white water, and the span between ship and wharf widened faster and faster, one ran one's eye along the groups on the receding decks from face to face, asking one's self, "Is it you who are to find fortune, you in the plush cap, or you in the brown sweater? Or is it you who are to be killed, you in the blanket roll, or you with the smart cravat?"

And so she went out, this last Argo, loaded with gold seekers from a land of gold, went out with the outgoing tide; and after the excitement was all over and the ship gone from sight, we others, you and I and all the rest of us, set our faces cityward and thought to ourselves, "Well, she's gone, and we ain't in her, and if that fool Batty comes back with a wad, I'll kick myself around the whole dam' lot for not goin'."

A prophet possessing honor in his own country is Maurus Jokai, the great Hungarian novelist. Several years ago he celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his literary career, and the occasion was made a national event, the Government, the aristocracy and people joining in the celebration, and the Emperor also, who created the novelist a member of the Hungarian House of Lords. Jokai is now over 72 years of age, but is still actively engaged with his pen. He has written over 300 volumes, and is at present at work on a dramatic epic entitled "Levente," which the novelist expects will fill a place in Maygar literature somewhat similar to that of the "Nibelungenlied" in German literature. Jokai is tall and slender in figure, with a massive forehead, gray hair, keen, piercing eyes, and a long white mustache and beard—altogether a kindly and pleasing countenance. He lives in Budapest with his son-in-law, Feszti, the famous Hungarian artist, in a handsome villa standing in its own park.

Mr. Jokai is a great worker; his day begins at 5 o'clock in the morning. Soon after he is at his desk, where he works with short intervals of rest until noon. After dinner he walks or drives and by 10 P. M. is invariably in bed. In writing his novels Jokai never takes notes. He lays out the plot of a new book in his head, then forms the incidents and characters, even the dialogues, and carries them in his mind until he is ready to put his pen to paper for the work. Sometimes he has carried plans and details of a book several years in his mind, before executing it.

THE ICY EL DORADO

Hardships and Dangers of the Chilkoot Route to Dawson—Wisdom of Waiting.

The excitement attending the rich discoveries of gold in the Yukon river district would seem to grow with the lapse of time, and only want of means for the journey or of a passage-ticket on an outgoing vessel deters hundreds of wistful gold-hungry souls from adding to the number of those who have set out during the past few days to reach the land of promise. All the news that is coming to hand confirms the first intelligence of the marvelous richness of the Klondyke district, and as the time remaining for reaching there by river steamers during the present season is now very limited, none who have harbored a thought of going have found a moment for hesitation. Besides the Alaska Commercial Company's steamer Excelsior, which sailed for St. Michael's on the 28th inst., with 120 passengers bound for the diggings, several hundreds have left by sea and land for more northerly ports to embark for the same ultimate destination, via St. Michael's or Juneau. Various other craft, even to small gasoline launches, have been chartered here, and will be employed in conveying men, women and stores en route to Dawson City, which is the present headquarters for adventurers. And all this notwithstanding the emphatic advice of experienced travelers and miners, transportation agents and Government officials to delay going in until the spring. Prudence is no part of a pioneer's outfit, however, and to preach its exercise is to talk to the winds. The pessimist for once has found his vocation gone and must wait a later opportunity to raise his voice. The time is not yet, for there are no willing ears.

To the man who can weigh the situation with intelligent deliberation the chances would seem to be in favor of awaiting developments. It is important to remember that the entire ground, which has been the scene of successful operations thus far, is said to have been alloted to claimants, so that there will necessarily have to be a good deal of prospecting work done in fresh places, and this cannot be effective, until after the end of the coming cold season, when the excavated soil can be washed and results ascertained. In the meantime transportation arrangements will be improved, many new supply stores will have been established and in all probability one or more shorter and easier routes opened up. Already it has been suggested by experienced travelers that it will be found advantageous to make for Fort Wrangel, thence by steamer up the Stickeen river to Telegraph creek and by portage to the Hootalingua river, where boats and rafts can be built to make the rest of the trip. Another route is to proceed to Ashcroft, B. C., pass through the Carribou gold fields by a good road over the divide—which is easily negotiated—separating those fields from the headwaters of the Yukon. The Chilkoot pass is even now being avoided by parties disembarking at Skaguay bay, this side of Dyea, and proceeding via the White pass, which is of a less difficult nature. Dyea having been constituted a port of sub-entry and therefore open to the ships of all nations will probably give traveler through British Columbia a good deal of advantage, an as the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Dominion Gov ernment are likely to facilitate matters by every mean in their power, it will be well for intending prospector to keep themselves informed as to what is going on i that direction. Active surveying operations are reporte with a view to the construction of a road or railroa from the ocean over the divide to the upper reaches o the Yukon river, but as matters stand at present the con sent of the Governments of the United States and Can ada would be needed before the work could be put i hand.

Mail routes, both Federal and Canadian, are likely t undergo immediate improvement, and it is understoo that California capitalists propose constructing a tele graph line from Juneau to Dawson City. At the sam time Wells, Fargo & Co. will probably extend their ex press service for gold shipments from the district t this port, while more than one local house of standin has laid plans for establishing branches of their tradin concerns at principal Alaskan ports. In the general rus that is bound to ensue to get into the new field for busi ness, it is evident that California intends to take a principal part. This is only as it should be, seeing what her own experience has been, and that to the Alaska Commercial Company, a San Francisco organization, are chiefly due such facilities as already exist for reaching and living on the spot. The Pacific Coast Steamship Company of this city is also to the fore with a regular line to Alaskan ports.

It has been suggested that the Northwest is being boomed, so that holders of claims may get the benefit of cheap labor. This is perhaps a charge that is hardly fair as matters stand, but it makes one stop to think that, even though the intention may not have existed, the result will be the same. Wages are said to be $10 to $15 a day at present, but it must be remembered that all days are not working days in that region, and even at those rates there is little profit on the cost of living, if living it can be called, when a man is advised to adopt Indian habits, clothe himself in skins smeared with oil, and, as a protection against mosquitoes, of abnormal venom, plaster face and hands with fat pork—and that only a partia lantidote to their determined onslaughts.

Something has been said about the inferiority of the gold from the Klondyke district, which has assayed at $15 per ounce only, in some cases, as against $18 for the California product. The presence of silver to an unusual extent in the dust and nuggets is said to account for the difference, which is of considerable importance; and it will be interesting to observe if this feature continues, as further shipments come to hand.

Representatives of prominent mining groups are said to have proceeded to the gold fields, with the object of ascertaining the outlook for quartz-crushing operations; and, if it should be found that indications favor that branch of work being undertaken, it is only reasonable to suppose that it will not be long ere steps are taken to establish several plants for the purpose. This departure would assuredly lead to the more rapid extension of the mining industry, and result in the permanent settlement of that part of the continent. From what little is known of the geological character of the country it seems likely that rich quartz veins will be discovered.

In the meantime transportation and supply would appear to offer a large field for enterprise, and, though it is impossible not to admire the intrepidity with which the outgoing adventurers are hastening to meet difficulties that in time may disappear in tneir quest for riches, one cannot but feel that, unless possessed of some of the qualities of such as Greely, Nansen or Andree, there will be many compelled to retreat from the conflict with nature and the many physical privations that under present conditions will have to be faced. The life of a California miner in pioneer days was no bed of roses, any more than that of the Australian digger in the fifties whom the writer has seen handling nuggets that th· Klondyke has yet to emulate; and still there were nc Arctic hardships to test their courage and endurance. The man who now waits for further light on the situation and the turn of the season may, in the end, have the least cause for regret.

The press dispatches from Ottawa, Canada, reporting that the Dominion Government has resolved to impose heavy royalties and make reservations of alternate claims in the British Yukon district need official confirmation. Besides evidencing hasty and contradictory compilation, the statements made lack the appearance of probability. No such policy has hitherto been adopted in British territorry in any part of the world.

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

The slight coolness which has been noticeable recently in the weather at Castle Crags has acted as a stimulant to the gay spirits who are summering there. During the past week the Tavern population quite outdid itself and furnished an amount of incident out of the ordinary even at that jolly resort. The crowning event of the season, however, took place on Monday night, when a sparkling comedietta entitled "The Train-Robber" was brilliantly presented. The plot hinged on the adventures of a wealthy plumber bent on enjoying life, a part which was taken by Mr. Paul Davis. E. C. Davis, Mrs. Davis, Mrs. Hopkins, Miss Barker and Miss Kitteridge also participated. Mrs. Davis, a very charming and sprightly woman, played the role of Mrs. Brownjones with agreeable vivacity, and Mrs. Charles Hopkins, who had been instrumental in getting up the play, was decidedly au fait as Mrs. Newport. Her gowns were really very smart. Otherwise there has been plenty of movement at the Crags. The Kips gave a picnic last week; there have been church entertainments at Dunsmuir; the shooting has been excellent, and everyone has been having a good time.

The presence in Sausalito of certain men of social distinction has added much to the importance and enjoyment of that seaside burg. Mr. Sheldon, Mr. Bowie and Mr. Claude Terry Hamilton have made the "Hutch" a center for little breakfasts and dinners, which are usually followed by a trip in Mr. Gus Costigan's launch. Then Mr. and Mrs. Charles Foster and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Macintosh are entertaining in their turn, so between them all there is something that approaches a movement in Sausalito. In this respect this city of the sea has a considerable advantage over its rivals at Belvedere and San Rafael, inasmuch as one seldom hears of gentlemen cottagers in either suburb doing aught for the happiness of outsiders. In both places are enough young men to form a solid substratum if they would but move, but the tendency seems to be toward suffering entertainment rather than entertaining.

Everyone with a horse who rode in the last paper chase says it was the best of the series thus far. It may be added that this has happened before. Though several of the more eminent among the chasers were up at the Jinks, some twenty-three riders followed the hares over a course laid out by Mr. Farnsworth. It was a very exciting finish, with Hugh Hume and Miss Bertha Smith in the lead, and to them the cups were consequently awarded. This week the victors are to act as hares, and there will be a field of thirty hounds if indications count for anything. On the 7th of August the great event of the paper-chasing season happens. On that day the contest occurs for the handsome silver cups given by the Ingleside Racing Association, and it is said that a big delegation of Burlingame men intend to participate. There is just a little rivalry between the Country and the Hunt Clubs, and there will be great jubilation if a San Rafael man wins. However, it would be unreasonable to gainsay the courage and experience of Hobart, the Tobins, Baldwin, Breedon, Lawson, Eyre and the others who will join the pack, but the Hunt Club does not take a back seat when it comes to riding, even with San Mateo. Anyway the affair will prove the most exciting even of several seasons. On that night there will be a ball at the Hotel Rafael, and Ross Valley and the entire environment will surely be represented. The course will be laid out by a professional rider, and even chances will be afforded the visitors.

Mr. and Mrs. William Fries had a wedding anniversary dinner at the Hotel Rafael on Wednesday night last, and it proved a very jolly affair, much enlivened by the hosts' witticisms. On Sunday Mr. and Mrs. Fries had a party at the top of Mount Tamalpais and entertained them at lunch. On Monday night last Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Crooks invited a party of people to dinner at Fairfax Villa. There is, of course, the usual amount of quiet entertaining going on—Welsh rarebit parties on the verandah at night, little musicales, etc. On Sunday a delegation of Ross Valley men usually come down to play tennis on the courts of the hotel. Everyone over there tries to amuse himself or herself in a congenial way, and altogether there seems an unusual degree of happiness.

Among the habitues of the Hotel Rafael there is expressed much regret over the sudden illness of Mr. Rosenstock, in consequence of which Mr. and Mrs. Nuttall and Mrs. Rosenstocks have returned to town for the season.

But little has been doing at the Presidio lately, and the recent transfers and forthcoming changes furnish the only topics of interest. Second Lieutenant John P. Hains has been promoted to a First Lieutenantship, and after September 14th will leave for his battery at Fort Barrancas, Fla. Leaves of absence for the month of August have been granted to Lieutenant Elmer W. Hubbard and to Lieutenant Samuel McP. Rutherford, who will report for instructions on September 1st at the United States Infantry and Cavalry School. Major David H. Kinzie, who has been at Fort Canby, Wash., has been transfered back to Alcatraz Island, of which station he is now in command. Altogether the midsummer quiet has penetrated to most of San Francisco's immediate environments, and Presidio circles have not escaped the ennui which pervades society in town.

An interesting engagement, which has just been announced, is that of Miss Kate Stanton, sister of Dr. James Stanton, the Railroad Commissioner, to Mr. Daniel Buckley. Miss Stanton is a decidedly handsome girl, possessed of many accomplishments, and is the daughter of Mr. James Stanton, one of the city's oldest and wealthy citizens. Mr. Buckley comes also from one of our pioneer families and has, for the past twenty years, been a trusted employe of the Hibernia Bank.

It has recently come to light that Dr. Humphrey, of Alameda, is the proud possessor of a "parki"—a thing of beauty and an especial joy during the present universal gold fever. To aid the unenlightented, however, it may be added that the "parki" is the only fur suit of clothing similar to those worn in the extreme North which is obtainable in these southern climes. Its original owner was an old Greenland chief, who parted with the outfit for the sum of $200 and a repeating rifle. Yet the San Francisco furriers to whom the doctor has shown his treasure place a high value on the coat, hood and moccasins, which are made of the finest skins of beaver, mink and seal. During its recent hunt for suitable clothing for E. J. Livernash, the 'Examiner" was particularly anxious to obtain the costume, but the exchange was not effected, as its owner then meditated a northern trip on his own account. However, he has recently given up the idea, I believe, so the "Monarch" will, in all probability, shortly exhibit the unique suit.

The latest fad of the younger set is "bocce" playing. This is the favorite Italian game played in alleys in the Latin Quarter, and its characteristics have been elaborately described in The Wave. The young people meet at dinner, go to the "bocce" court and there finish up with supper at the ladies' grill-room, which is the very smartest place nowadays.

Quite a center of festivity is the camp of the Hoffmans and Crosbies at Liberty's. It is delightfully situated, and the habitues know how to organize entertainments. Quite a large party of young men rode up there Sunday morning and spent the day there.

The death of Colonel Crocker has cast a shadow over affairs in San Mateo. He had begun to take a serious interest in the burg, and undoubtedly could have done much for the forwarding of its ambitions. There was the liveliest regret expressed over the loss—a regret not founded altogether on interest, but on the regard which the citizens had begun to feel for the honest worth of Colonel Crocker's character.

Society in Oakland has done but little to keep the ball a-roling this week. Not even the usual amount of entertainment is offered for comment. Indeed, nothing whatever has happened to relieve the humdrum quiet of life in town. There were a few entertainments, mostly of an informal nature, and these were generally given in honor of visitors. Miss Conklin, of Salt Lake, who has been the guest of Mrs. Howard Bray, has been the recipient of considerable attention during her stay. At present she is visiting friends in San Francisco, and will be absent for some days. There is no set in Oakland which gets more genuine fun out of life than the contingent of Fruitvalers which contains the Brays, Hushes, Clays and Magees. The latest addition to their circle is Mr. and Mrs. Moulder, who have rented a place in that neighborhood for the midsummer months. Mr. and Mrs. Rossier, nee Pope, are back from San Diego, and at present are visiting Mrs. Rossier's parents at Highland Park. Upon the conclusion of their visit the couple will reside in San Francisco.

A general thinning out is evidenced throughout Alameda County, and this, needless to say, has transferred all manner of gaiety to other scenes. At Sonoma the summer season is in full swing, and the vicinage is alive with representatives of the Oakland beau monde. Of these the Merry Tramps are a most typical camping party. The country thereabouts is filled with pretty summer homes, and each and every one of these has been harboring its jolly house party. During the past week the Hutchinsons have been visited by the Pringles and Professor A. P. Hayne, and Miss Mira Prather, Miss Havens. Miss Sessions and Miss Ella Wall are enjoying Mrs. Charles Havens' hospitality, so with the people and the propitious situation a jolly season is being passed.

The Klondyke excitement which, during the last ten days has, like a devastating wave swept the length and breadth of the country, is producing disastrous results in Alameda, a town never remarkable for its surplus of male inhabitants. As has been evidenced in all other places, the attainment of the golden fleece appeals alike to all classes, without discrimination, and from the capitalist to the laborer recruits to the army of prospective bonanza kings are being drawn. A few from the jeunesse doree of Alameda have also joined in this pilgrimage to the frozen Mecca of the North. Douglas Waterman, the young cotillion leader of Deux Temps Club fame, left Wednesday on the Excelsior, having received an appointment as assayer for the Alaska Commercial Company. Among the older residents who have been fever-stricken may be mentioned Messrs. George Whittell, Charles E. Severance and C. A. Hooper. These gentlemen have formed a syndicate which will send its representatives to the gold fields under the supervision of Mr. Severance, the excursion sailing in one of a line of vessels owned by a member of the syndicate Then there are others, droves of them, who are planning departure for the promised land, but fortunately, the majority will wait till the spring slightly lessens the dangers at present attendant upon the trip.

In the August "St. Nicholas" there are a number of good things for little people. Among them is a story about a dog named Peter Spots, who was a real fireman, and turned out with the machine at every alarm. A pretty story for girls is "Priscilla's Fairy Godmother," a fairy tale that came true, by Gertrude Halladay, and Gustave Kobbe has an entertaining chapter on fishing along the eastern coast. Elsie Hill contributes a very pretty poem, "The Prince's Cake," quaintly illustrated by George Varian. The continued stories are "Master Skylark," "The Last Three Soldiers," and "Miss Nina Barrow." A. Hyatt Verill writes about bees and how they live, and Rev. Felix J. O'Neill has an amusing poem, "Timmy Top-Notch."

In the "Quest of the Gilt-Edged Girl" (John Lane), by Richard de Lyrienne—a parody on Le Gallienne's "Golden Girl"—appear several poetic travesties, the best of which are the following—one after Dr. Watts and the other in the Kipling manner. The book itself is very poor humor.

Haywards Park is one of the most delightful resorts during the summer season. Concerts are given every Sunday afternoon from 1 to 5. Take the Oakland, San Leandro and Haywards Electtic Railway—the ride is a delightful one, and insures a pleasant Sunday outing. The Club House at the Park provides excellent refreshments. Round trip 50 cents.

The Maison Riche serves the best lunch in the city for 75 cents.

Doings of the Week in the Dramatic World.

Francis Carlyle has a whole play to himself at the Alcazar this week. It is Clay M. Greene's "Reclaimed," a one-act affair, and although differing little from most pieces of the kind, it gives Mr. Carlyle very good opportunities for effective work. Miss Selene Johnson has an emotional part which she plays in a conscientious manner and a modish white gown. The piece of the evening is "Gloriana," the comedy which suited Henrietta Crosman to perfection. Adele Belgarde is the Alcazar's Gloriana, and she comes on in a gorgeous gown of pink and black, a dream of a hat, and a wig of melting brown. Miss Belgarde's acting may discreetly be termed spontaneous—perhaps exuberant would be better It is never really bad, but it seldom succeeds in convincing. If Miss Belgarde would tone her action down a bit, and roll her eyes a little less, she would develop into a very acceptable actress, for her manners are gentle, her face and form are fair to see, and her moods are always amiable. Miss Bergie Harrison has a veritable suggestion in style and manner of the real soubrette, which is something good to see. As the maid, Kitty, she has a capital part, but she displays a tendency to overact—a tendency she should carefuly avoid.

A clever dramatization of George Manville Fenn's novel, "This Man's Wife," is being played at Morosco's under the title of "The Defaulter. The dramatic interest of the story, the pathos and humors have been ingenuously woven into the play and combine to make an altogether interesting drama. It is well put on at Morosco's, well staged and capably acted. Maud Luna Hall as Millicent Halm, the unhappy wife, has a part peculiarly suited to her. She gives natural expression to her conflicting emotions, gaining sympathy in her sorrow and approval in her happiness. Fred J. Butler, as Robert Halm, the defaulting husband, has something very much in his average line of work and is about as successfully bad as he could possibly be Mortimer Snow invests Christy Bailey with virtue sufficient for a regiment and palliates much of Mr. Hahn's wickedness. The most convincing work in the piece, next to Miss Hall's is Landers Stevens as Sir Gordon Browne, a dignified and dramatic conception, the very antithesis of Mr. Stevens' character in last week's play. The Australian prison scene is attractively set up, and the rush on the bank is full of effective realism

The Orpheum programme for this week, though not at all up to its usual standard of excellence, has yet an attraction in Papinta that is in itself alone quite worth the price of admission. Her fire dance and white dance is quite as good as Fuller's, while the mirror dance is as captivating as anything seen here in a long time. It is said that her fire dance is rather literal from her point of view, and that the heat from the arc light beneath her—right from the main—is something terrific. Harry Le Clair as Richelieu, Mephistopheles and the drunken coster woman is fairly interesting, though, of course, he horribly overdoes his characterization. As the coster female he is much the best, and his song here is quite pardonable; his Richelieu and Mephistopheles songs could be ommitted to great advantage. The Dionzos in their barrel jumping business would be better if better trained. Ida Gray Scott has hardly any excuse for her appearance, gifted with neither voice, face nor manner, and Imogen Comer is scarcely more acceptable. Sousa's new march, a merely orchestral number, called the "Stars and Stripes Forever," is almost as entertaining as anything on the far side of the footlights. As said, the performance is "not up to sample," but there is promise of better things to come.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

DRAMATIC NOTES

The matrimonial woes of the Lady Susan Harabin will claim attention at the Columbia next week through the medium of Henry Arthur Jones' familiar comedy, "The Case of Rebellious Susan." Blanche Bates will play the headstrong Susan, and it is reasonable to suppose she will play it charmingly. Another reasonably pleasant prospect is Frank Worthing as Sir Richard Kato. It is very likely Mr. Worthing will make more of the part than did Mr. Kelcey, for the Frawley's leading man has much more by-play and amusing humor than had the leading man of the Lyceum. The comedy is supplied chiefly by Admiral Sir Joseph Darby. Lemoyne's old, to be played by Theodore Hamilton, and a silly young couple, Mr. and Mrs. Ferguson Pybus, played by Harry Corson Clarke and Gladys Wallis. Eleanor Moretti will have a congenial role, also Mr. Frawley, who reappears in the cast. After "Rebellious Susan" "The Idler," that delightful Lyceum play, will be given.

Francis Carlyle is particularly fortunate in having one-act plays especially written for him. Next week at the Alcazar he will appear in another clever little sketch entitled "House or Home," the work of Glen MacDonough. As Tom Howard Mr. Carlyle will have good opportunities for effective work, in which he will be assisted by Miss Selene Johnson, Mr. Charles Bryant and Mr. Walter Belasco. Following "House or Home" will come C. F. Burnard's three-act comedy, "Betsy," in which Miss Bergie Harrison will assume the title role. Miss Harrison gave evidence of clever comedy last week in "Gloriana," and as the maid Betsy in next week's piece will likely improve with the increased advantage. Three new members of the company make their first appearance, Uiric Collins, Frank Nicholson and Wallace Shaw.

Like a vision of a day departed, a day of roses and old lavender, "Rosemary" will come next week to the Baldwin with John Drew as Sir Jasper and Isabel Irving as Dorothy. The quaint serenity of "The Mayflower" bids well for Mr. Parker's lines in "Rosemary"; it leads one to expect much that is delightfully old-fashioned and agreeable. Mr. Drew has never had a more successful play; it affords him every available opportunity and a chance to display his versatility as well. Isabel Irving may be expected to be an ideal Dorothy with her pretty face and dainty ways. Mr. Drew's company includes Harry Harwood, Arthur Byron, Daniel Harkins, Grahame Henderson, Mrs. Annie Adams, Mrs. Deloss King and Miss Sarah Converse.

The first production in San Francisco of Ada Lee Bascom's play of New York life, "A Bowery Girl," will be given at Morosco's next Monday evening. Miss Bascom is a Californian, and is well known in this city and in San Jose, which was her home for many years, and the production of her play will likely bring out many of her old friends. "A Bowery Girl" calls for special scenic effects, among them the Bowery at night, the Palisades on the Hudson, and the housetops of New York with a view of the Brooklyn bridge.

The Orpheum announces for next week the great European novelty, Professor Leonidas and his educated cats and dogs, also Miss Mary Arniotis, who is said to be the strongest woman in the world. Both Professor Leonidas and Miss Arniotis are expected to make pronounced sensations. Other new people in the bill are the three Rackett Brothers, musical harvesters, and Elvira Francelli and Tom Lewis, vocalists and travestists. Papinta continues in the performance, also The Delonzos, Crawford and Manning and Ida Grey Scott.

LATE VERSE

Carmen.

Carmen, in whose wondrous eyes of thine,
Where languid lights and dreamy depths
Strive for the mastery;
In thine eyes, twin lakes of loveliness,
My wayward heart has fallen in.
And floats to rest
Away to dreamland where the lights are gold,
And perfumed breezes ride by
To dreamland love-land where the streamlets run
And sing beneath an amber sky.

Carmen, like some princess of old Spain,
Some royal daughter of the Moor,
A princess so art thou.
Princess of my dreams and of my love,
O thou art fair, and gentle thought
Sits calmly on thy brow.
Sweet princess of my dreams and of my heart,
Sweet princess of the sunlit eyes,
I'll sing of thee upon the lutes of love
Till every star in heaven replies.

Carmen, Carmen, I could love thee well
On some bleak island in the sea,
Or far off in Seville.
In some bower of dreams, white with the moon,
Where dripping fountains sweet would sing.
And all the world was still.
O I could love thee with a perfect love,
With love that words could never say,
With such a love that every passing wind
Would pause and sigh and faint away.

Carmen, Carmen, as the lustrous moon,
The calm white maiden of the night,
Sits in the starlit sky;
So art thou enthroned in my heart,
And thou shalt rule my days and dreams
Till life is all gone by.
I'll love thee till the days of life are dead,
Till every star has dropped away,
And when all time has fled—I'll love thee in The light of the eternal day.

—Henry S. Kirk.

The Complete Angler.

How doth the angler, blithe and gay,
From morn to twilight hour,
Gather rheumatics all the day
From every passing shower.

How cheerfully upon the hook
He threads the wriggling bait;
The number of the fish he took
He multiplies by eight.

What makes his comely face so bright?
Why does his basket clink?
Because, although he get no bite,
He's certain of a drink.

And though he be of manners mad,
This trait in him is odd;
He certainly won't spare the child
Who may have spoiled the rod.

His sense of etiquette is fine—
Politeness is his whim—
He always drops the fish a line
To come and dine with him.

Bismark, who had worn himself out in the service of his country, one morning, while out riding with Emperior William, complained of fatigue. To the Emperor's testy comment on the younger man's lack of endurance, Bismark gave this epigrammatic reply: "Ah, sire," he said, "the rider always outlasts the horse."

A gentleman's drink, is the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey.

"THE CONNOISSEUR"

Stories and Facts About Famous Collectors and Collections.

In considering such a book as "The Connoisseur" (Longmans, Green & Co.), the question of literary merit is subsidiary to that of entertainment and instruction. The collector who possesses the gift of talk may prove the most diverting of companions, yet he is also conceivable as the most profound bore. To care for the gossip of pictures, bibliography, or porcelain, one must have either a predilection for fine pictures, rare books or old china, or a dilettante tendency that expresess itself is the direction of some other fad. He who has hunted ancient bookstores after finest editions, or has sorted old manuscripts to find valuable relics, is readily interested in the experiences of other collectors. Besides, the acquirement of treasures often tries the mental and physical resources of the individual, converts him into a diplomatist—maybe a thief. The fever of desire once in the blood, conscience and principle become ineffective guardians of morals. A museum is often the creation of an individual for whom it is merely an assemblage of trophies. Every object recalls a contest; there is a reminiscence for each plate, cabinet and canvas. They are fleeting hours when such a curator is telling of his victories

That the "ideal connoisseur must be a man who has practiced art with success in the commencement of life, and has relinquished his profession for the study and acquisition of works of art in general," may be true, as Mr. Robinson urges, but the names of citizens who have developed late in life both the fever and the intelligence, yet have had only a commercial education to guide their course, quickly occur to the mind of the writer. It seems the fact that he who develops the desire for masterpieces often grows instinctively appreciative of their merits and values. He is as liable to pick up a treasure as some other sage who has studied in the Beaux Arts and walked the museums of Europe. Take, for instance, Ralph Bernal, who had a genius for finding artistic valuables in unlikely places. There is to-day in the British Museum "King Lothaire's Magic Crystal"—a circle four inches in diameter engraved with a representation of the story of Susannah and the Elders, and the words, "Lotharius Rex Franc fieri jussit." It was found in an old curiosity shop in Brussels and sold to a Bond street dealer for $2. Bernal purchased it for $50, and in the course of years the museum obtained the crystal for $1,300. Such was Bernal's reputation that the dealers used to hide their acquisitions from his eyes until they had been examined by the ablest connoisseurs and their value ascertained. One night Bernal entered Colnaghi's print shop in Pall Mall and found the late Daniel Colnaghi, who was an expert in his line, turning over a heap of prints just purchased at a sale. Glancing over his shoulders Bernal espied a proof of Hogarth's "Midnight Modern Conversation," and said carelessly, "You seem to have got a good impression there; what will you take for it?" Colnaghi, busy searching for better things said, without looking at the print, "Three guineas; shall I send it home for you?" "No; I'll take it with me," said Bernal, who, as he rolled up the print chuckled over the idea of having got the rare early impression on which the word modern is spelt "moddern" This proof was subsequently sold to the British Museum for $400.

The most interesting chapters of Mr. Robinson's book are those that deal with old-time collectors and their treasures Never, he declares has there been such a rage for collecting as at the moment, due to the spread of artistic education and the rise of provincial museums. In olden days a certain German, Doctor Waagen, was sent traveling through England to discover what the big noblemen had in their houses, for in those days noblemen alone had museums He describes the collections of Stowe and Hamilton Palaces, both of which have since been brought to the hammer One had to have a great deal of money to indulge such expensive tastes, and collecting was really a form of dudishness. The press made fun of such proclivities. Indeed it is amusing to read how the "Times" laughed contemptuously when Horace Walpole's collection at Strawberry Hill was offered for sale. Thirty-four years later it devoted columns to extolling a single rare picture which had figured among his treasures. It was a splendid collection this; it contained a silver bell made by Cellini for Clement VII., the missal of Claude, the neglected Queen of Francis I.; a wonderful hunting-horn of Limoges, enamel pictured with the life of St. Hubert, made for Francis I., which sold in 1892 for nearly $7,000. There was also a silver-gilt timepiece bearing a true-lover's knot, which Henry VIII. gave to Anne Boleyn on her marriage morning.

Things have changed since the British Museum entered the ranks of collectors. In the olden days the representatives of the nation had to furnish beforehand an estimate of the price that coveted lots were likely to fetch, which was almost an impossible task. Finally they determined to throw restrictions overboard and buy as unfettered competitors. Once $600 was paid for a majolica plate known as "The Painter." Nowadays $10,000 would not purchase it. Since then, too, $350,000 has been paid by the National Gallery for a Raphael.

The tremendous advance in the price of pictures of Sir Joshua Reynolds and Gainsborough is noted. A landscape of Gainsborough, which sold for $4,000 in 1867, fetched $16,000 at Sir Julian Goldshmid's sale last year. Rembrandt's etchings have gone up tremendously in value. A print of "Christ Healing the Sick" was sold for $35 in 1755, and in 1887 $6,000 was paid for it.

A pretty story is told about the Chevalier De Claussin, who catalogued Rembrandt's works. Though poor he was anxious to buy a fine proof of a very scarce etching called "Advocate Van Tol," which he required to complete his collection. At the sale the bidding advanced to a thousand dollars, when Claussin determined to appeal to the heart of the unknown competitor who was waging so hard a fight. "Gentlemen," he said in English, "I am the Chevalier Claussin I have devoted a large portion of my life to preparing a new catalogue of Rembrandt. For twenty-five years I have searched for the 'Advocate Van Tol.' I beg my competitors to take into consideration the service that my work may render to amateurs, and the sacrifices that all my life I have imposed upon myself to form a collection which will enable me to make fresh observations of the masterpieces of Rembrandt. A little generosity gentlemen!" The crowd smiled and whispered to each other that this same Monsieur De Claussin, who was capable of running up a print to a thousand dollars might often be seen of a morning in the streets of London going to fetch in a little jug his twopennyworth of milk. Unfortunately the appeal was vain. His adversary obtained the prize.

The stories of the experiences of collectors make very interesting gossip. Mr. Robinson tells of the hazardous journeys in time of war through Italy for the purpose of buying en bloc a collection which a half-dozen purchasers were anxious to snap up. Many are the tales of the purchase of church plate when it has been necessary to judiciously grease the palms of half a cathedral chapter, and instances of his holiness, the Bishop displaying a brighter diamond on his finger after he had facilitated the exchange of his old communion plate for new are by no means rare. There was in Segovia an "alcazar" used as a barracks, in which there was a room lined with a dado of exquisite Moorish tiling. The public were not admitted to the ruins, and the only way to get at them was to bribe a soldier. This was done, but to the collector's disgust there was one tile wanting to complete the pattern. The soldier would not understand the omission, so the collector had to slip in while the sentry was busy with a market cart to obtain the missing tile. As he was rushing out he heard behind him a noise like thunder. He looked back; the ruined tower in which he had been a moment before had fallen in.

The chapter about frauds and forgeries contains lots of good stories. "The first artistic fraud," says Mr. Robinson, "was perpetrated as early as 1510, when a certain Italian, Marc Antonio, copied the engravings of Albert Durer and signed them with that worthy's initials. These clever imitations were freely bought and sold as the works of Durer, and it is very difficult to tell the original from the copy. This is where the connoisseur comes in, however, for no matter how carefully the imitator imitates, there is sure to be some difference.

Apropos of frauds, Mr. Robinson tells of a splendid crucifix of early date originally the treasured possession of an Hungarian Cathedral. Given to a jeweller to repair, he made first a copy, then transplanted parts from the original to the new cross until it was impossible to pronounce either genuine. That which he left the more original of the two he sold to an Italian nobleman, whence it found its way to London, where investigation revealed the imposture. The best experts are taken in at times. Witness the purchase for $50,000 by the Louvre authorities of a so-called golden tiara of the Scythian King Saitapharnes. It had previously been declined by Dr. Burges of the Vienna Museum, and now comes Professor Furtwangler, the great German expert, who declares it an imposture and asserts it to be the work of a smart craftsman in Otschakow, South Russia. There have been frauds in manuscripts and majolica ware. Sevres China was imitated by an English Quaker in Staffordshire, and in Wardour street, London, imitation oak is still being purchased for the real article.

The history of gems abounds in instances of fraud. There has been for many years a great demand for antique gems, and Roman engravers have engaged themselves duplicating the ancient stones. For a long time it proved imposible to simulate the peculiar appearance of the salient surfaces of these gems. An astute engraver finally hit on the idea of cramming his creations down the throats of turkeys cooped for the purpose. The continued attrition which the gems received from contact with other stones and pebbles crammed simultaneously into the bird's crop ultimately induced the same effect. An interesting subject of controversy was the collection of 3,000 gems cut by modern Roman engravers for Prince Poniatowsky, who died in Florence in 1833. It was declared that he proposed to palm them off as antiques, but this was denied, his friends declaring he had prescribed each design and had affected his artisans with the real antique spirit. The collection was offered the English Government for $130,000, but was refused An arch-forger was a Hanoverian spy who was attached to the person of the young Pretender, Baron Stosch To the latter and his associate a M. Hardieu was exhibiting the ring of Michael Angelo, said to be the work of Pyroteles, and now one of the chief glories of the Bibliotheque in Paris. It commemorated the birth of Alexander the Great. Suddenly the jewel disappeared. Hardieu knew his man, however, and quietly sent his servant out for a strong emetic, which he compelled the Hanoverian to swallow The ring was happily rediscovered.

The stories of lucky finds are always full of interest. Some time ago there hung a fine game piece in the dining-room of a Greenwich hotel to which hundreds of people went daily to eat whitebait. One day a connoisseur came there, recognized the piece as a veritable Snyders, and twenty years afterwards, hearing that the place was for sale, purchased the canvas and frame for $12.

Concluding his essay on the ideal Collector," our author thus describes the home in which he has housed his treasures: "What diverse epochs and styles here jostle together! Look on this Louis Quinze side table with gilt legs and marble top. At one end is a charming little high-born French maiden of 1750 with sweet expression, as yet unhardened by the callousness of a heartless period; at the other end—St. John the Baptist in the guise of a little Italian gamin betrays the master-hand of Donatello. Next, the figures on a large Venetian door-knocker of bronze are taking stock with gravity of a curious Japanese dragon of archaic type. A dead Christ by Michael Angelo rests on a companion table flanked on one side by Demosthenes, the orator with broad head and nervous lips; on the other by the strained expression of a fine example of the so-called Seneca. Italian cassoni, French clocks of Boule's work, cabinets of Japanese lacquer, with Dutch mounts in metal; cabinets of the curious ivory inlay of the Indo-Portuguese manufacture of Goa."

LA GALLIENNE'S RUBAIYAT

The young English poet has attempted a new version of Omar Khayyam. The "Cosmopolitan" publishes a second installment of verses, from which these are excerpts.

'Tis a strange world we came to, You and I—
Whence no man knows, and surely none knows why;
Why we remain—a harder question still;
And still another—whither when we die?

Some say we came God's purpose to fulfill—
Faith! a poor purpose, then, if so you will;
Sport for the heavenly huntsmen, others say—
Sorry the sport, methinks, and poor the skill.

Passionate particles of dust and sun,
Run your brief race, nor ask why it is run—
We are but shadow-pictures, voices, dreams;
Perchance they make and break us just for fun.

O weary man upon a weary earth!
What is this toil, that men call living, worth—
This dreary agitation of the dust,
And all this strange mistake of mortal birth?

O love! before Death comes to make our bed,
Drink wine, red wine, red as the rose is red.
Our bodies are not gold, that we should hope
For men to dig us up when we are dead.

This sounding world is but a dream that cries
In Fancy's ears, and lives in Fancy's eyes;
Death lays his finger on the darkening soul
And all the glowing shadow fades and flies.

Shall Death, that shuts the ears and locks the brain,
Teach us what eager Life hath sought in vain?
Yet have I heard, so wild is human guess,
This dullard Death shall make Life's meaning plain.

Mysterious mother-substance, who are they
That flout the earth that made them? Who are they Who waste their wonder on the fabulous soul?
I can but choose to marvel at the clay.

This clay, this dream-sown sod, this chemic earth,
This wizard dust, wherein all shapes of birth—
Soft flowers, great beasts, and huge pathetic kings—
Small shapes of wonder, fill a needle's girth.

Would you seek beauty, seek it underground;
Would you find strength—the strong are underground;
And would you next year seek my love and me,
Who knows but you must seek us—underground.

TALES BETTER UNTOLD

The "Black Cat's" Story Competition and Its Consequences.

Of late that little magazins published under the alluring title of "The Black Cat," has been offering prizes for the best original short stories, and announcing and heralding the offer with the proper amount of trumpetings, bass-drummings and fire-workings. Twenty-six hundred dollars is the aggregate cash total of the prizes offered, and every thing connected therewith, even to the titles of the stories themselves, is printed in red ink. Since July four of these prize stories have appeared, item, "For Dear Old Yale" ($300 prize); item, "A Geometrical Design" ($100 prize); item, "Her Bare Foot ($200 prize); item, "Ezra Callingford's Figure 4 Trap" ($100 prize)

"For Dear Old Yale" is a play for the gallery, written for old grads. by an enthusiastic, and, we fancy, a very buoyant and particularly callow young grad. It relates how a Yale graduate, whilom of the eleven, gave up his life to slaughtering kines on "the upper waters of the Euphrates" for the purpose of saving that of his professor. Eli goes to his death singing:

"Balm of Gilead, Gilead,
Balm of Gilead, Gilead,
Balm of Gilead, we won't go there any more."

Of course, it's an old Yale song, and of course, a peculiarly appropriate and adaptable death song The point most clearly brought out in the sale is the enthusiasm of Mr. Janus Langston (the author) for his alma mater. Enthusiasm of the average lower class man for his college is, perhaps, a praiseworthy emotion, but one in which the reading public are only mildly interested. As for the style of the tale, all that one can say is that one would prefer one's Kipling straight. Kipling and water, or let us say for the benefit of Janus Langston—Y. '95 (?)—Kipling and milk is not a diet which the great G. P. greatly desire. Also, and incidentally, we learn that James Langston is—ah, me!—a poker player and knows that a flush beats two pair. This also is, perhaps, a result of the very young gentleman's Yalesian career, and much might be said in this place as to the temptations of college life. However, we are now attending to $2,600 literature of The Cat which is Black. Mr James Langston's story is very boyish, crude stuff, precisely such stuff as would be written by the sophomore who went in for all the "literary courses" of the curriculum, helped edit the weekly paper, fell down and worshipped at the shrine of the great little Chee-Chee, and upon whose diploma the ink was scarcely dried Of restraint, of the superlative value of concealment, suggestion and indirection the very young gentleman has yet much to learn. The idea of the story is unoriginal the manner of telling as direct and crude as a phonograph, the situations are forced to the brink of absurdity, and the simple demands of naturalness and probability unheeded at every turn And yet this "Dear Old Yale" rubbish is the best of the prize story lot.

The other three are all constructed upon the same sail plan. The interest of the story is woven about some one piece of fiction "business" for want of a better, and in each case this "business," this "machine," gives the name to the tale. Poe invented this type when he wrote the "Gold Bug," and imitative writers of "freak" stories have since been harping upon the same chord so long that it is frayed and worn and emits but the flattest note. For instance, in "The Bare Foot" story the "business" is a mysterious woman's foot. In "The Geometrical Design" it is the figure of a circle within a circle, a mark which is supposed to locate a hidden treasure, and in "Ezra Callingford" the thing is a most elaborate figure-four trap, by means of which absurd and useless device an old sea captain commits suicide. There is no art required to spin yarns such as these. There are plenty of sophomores of the Langston type that can write them with both hands, as it were The last two stories are merely negatively stupid, but "The Bare Foot" thing is positively, obtrusively bad, lugging in a girl who desires the photograph of her bare foot for a reason altogether independent of the real tale. Her bare foot has no connection with the bare foot of the story, and is brought in merely for the sake of complication.

"Black Cat's" prize stories thus far do not justify their name. It is quite probable that nine out of every ten urban newspapers would reject them with the utmost promptness. The conclusion of the whole matter is the same which many an editor has already discovered. The offering of big cash prizes does not and never will bring the best stuff to light so long as the offer comes from a comparatively obscure magazine. The best authors, at least the best of the younger authors, do not write for cash prizes, but for reputation. There are plenty among them who would rather have the eclat of publication in any one of the "Big Four" magazines than the biggest cash prize the "Cat" or any other struggling periodical ever offered. They may possibly get over this idea when they get older, but by that time they usually have a reputation of their own and can command a price which in itself is a prize

A Melange of Dialect, Fiction and Fact About Insect Life.

Little romance should be expected from the inhabitants of Fryin' Pan and Cracker's Neck and other West Virginia and Kentucky mountain settlements, for little romance have they known. Their lives have been passed principally in talking dialect—wonderful and weird—given to the world many a time by as many venturesome novelists. One of the latest and best volumes of Kentucky dialect is "Hell Fer Sartin, and Other Stories," by John Fox, Jr., published by Harper Brothers. The stories are cleverly descriptive of maners and customs, and are full of humor, a touch of which, together with the dialect, are worthy of attention:

"Well, hain't the groun' rich? Won't hit raise no tabaccy nur corn nur nothin'?"

"Ole Tom jes whispers." ("Old Tom" isn't able to speak above a whisper.)

"To tell you the p'int-blank truth, stranger, that land is so durned pore that I hain't nuver been able to raise my voice."

An exhaustive and satisfactory work on nature's study is "Insect Life" (D. Appleton & Company) by John Henry Comstock, Professor of Entomology in Cornell and Stanford Universities Profesor Comtock believes that all life, animal and otherwise, is linked together in such a way that no part of the chain is unimportant. In his book he gives reasons for this belief in a lengthened discussion of insect existence which is as logical as it is interesting. The book contains a great number of original illustrations engraved by Anna Botsford Comstock, and also a few appropriate poetical references.

The first publication of the writings of the late Thomas Wharton was a translation from the Odes of Horace, made at the age of fifteen. Almost his very last, and admittedly his best story, is "Bobbo," which has just been republished by Harper & Brothers with other of Mr. Wharton's writings under title of "Bobbo, and Other Fancies." other fancies consist of "The Lost Sonnet Prinzivalle di Cembino," "Ratu Tanito's Wooing: A Tale of the Southern Seas," "Old and New," and a number of verses, some of them from the French of Francois Villon. Owen Wister contributes an introduction to the book—a sketch of Wharton's life and works.

The most amusing sketch in Ruth McEnery Stuart's new book of Southern stories, "In Simpkinsville" (Harper & Brothers), is "Weeds," a romance of the Simpkinsville Cemetery It tells of a man and a woman both bereft of wife and husband, who daily visit the cemetery, he to bury a rosebud on the grave of his departed and she to keep the grass green above the ashes of her dead. It seemed that the dead husband was not as temperate as he might have been, and for this very reason his widow labored more energetically at his tomb. To use her own words, "Somehow pore John never stood ez high ez I'd liked him to among the livin', and I have been ambitious to have him stand well among the dead." The most original, and in many ways the most characteristic, of the sketches is "The Unlived Life of Little Mary Ellen," a pathetic story of a woman who was deserted by her fiancee an hour before the time set for the wedding. Poor Mary Ellen goes out of her mind and lives for the rest of her days forgetful of her sorrow. Another interesting sketch is "The Dividing Fence," which, like "Weeds," treats of widows and widowers coming together under amusing though pathetic circumstances.

A well known violincellist visited a certain town with a view to giving a concert. "A concert?" said the proprietor of the only available hall, "I don't think you'll have success with a concert here. We had a snake charmer performing only last week, and the folks take some time to get over that!"

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever. Nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give one hundred dollars for any case of deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

TURF TOPICS

Racing and Breeding Items — New Rules of the Turf Congress.

In recent notes in these columns it was stated that Ornament had been described as standing about 16 hands and weighing, say, 1100 pounds. The Thoroughbred Record, of Lexington, Ky., is good enough to quote my remarks in connection with the colt, whose prowess is of much interest to California, where his sire and dam are now located, and, in doing so, adds the remark that he is scarcely 15.3 and would certainly not weigh 1100 pounds by a good deal. Evidently another case of a good thing being made up in a little parcel. The Record reports the shipment of Ornament to Saratoga to undergo his preparation for the Detroit Derby on August 10th.

It has been decided by Mr. James Shaw Robinson, of Hanford, to send Islington back to England, where he will take his place in the stud of his breeder, Captain H. McCalmont, M. P., along with his full brother Isinglass. The removal of Islington from California will be a loss to breeding interests in this State, as he has been the only representative here of the valuable Isonomy blood. His get ran this season for the first time, and although not handled to the best advantage have made a good impression. The best performer among them has proved to be Michael III, who scored a win the East a few days ago in good company, and was one of the best 2-year-olds on this Coast last spring.

Mr. W. O'B. Macdonough has had the misfortune to lose the 3-year-old colt Orestes, by imp. Ormonde out of imp. Kissing Crust, the youngster being the first of the great Ormonde's get born on American soil. Shortly before the Realization stakes, in which the colt was engaged, he picked up a nail, tetanus ensued and in a few days he died.

The celebrated sire, Eolus, died at the Ellerslie stud, Virginia, a few days ago, at the age of 29, after a career at the stud that was really brilliant, more especially when his somewhat limited opportunity in the way of mares is considered. He was the sire of Eole, St. Saviour, Elkwood, Knight of Ellerslie, Eurus, Eon, Russell, Morello and others, whose names will remain written on the brightest pages of American turf history, whether of the course or the farm. Both St. Saviour and Morello, the latter now dead, have left their mark on California breeding, and his son. Eole now at Mr. A. B. Spreckels' farm, in Napa, is also expected to beget good stock.

The new rules of the Turf Congress alluded to last week have received the approval of the best element in racing circles. There has been much said about the motives behind the new movement, and Mr. Corrigan's hand in it has been freely criticised. Of course, it is perfectly well understood that he formerly held out for foreign book rights, but that he has now come to see they are incompatible with sound turf methods, and has sided with the reformers, is all the more satisfactory. In business a man has to be on the right side, or he will surely get left, and the only side to be on in turf ventures is that of clean sport. The little talk of the President of the Jockey Club with our racing authorities here, Mr. Corrigan included, last winter, has been productive of much good, and there is more to follow.

The appalling outflow of newspaper comment after the Realization on the management of the winner, The Friar, in that and other events just previously, has led to the formation of the Horsemen's Protective Society in New York. Owners, trainers and jockeys have thus combined with the view of bringing to account legally any writer or publisher who may use his powers unfairly to the injury of members of the society. It is to be hoped there may not be sumcient warrant for active operations on the part of such an organization, though there is certainly too much prominence given by turf-writers to the financial bearing, rather than the sporting merits, of racing events, possibly from the ignorance of most of the commentators of the science of racing and the peculiarities of so uncertain and delicate an animal as is the average thoroughbred. If managing editors and race-track proprietors would strictly forbid their employees to bet themselves, under any circumstances, it would be to the advantage of the public who patronize sport. The latter want unbiased judgments and this they cannot get from men who habitually back their opinions and information at the bookmakers' stands.

The Pacific Coast Trotting Horse Breeders' Association will open their summer meeting, extending to August 7th, at the Oakland track this afternoon, giving seven days' harness racing. The sport will probably be superior to anything of the kind we have had in San Francisco for some time. There is a large contingent of trotters and pacers that have not yet been seen in public, which fact should lend a freshness to the contests that is lacking when the performers' exact abilities are known. Besides what may be called the green division many animals of established reputation will face the starter, and training reports encourage the belief that most of these will sustain, even if they do not excel, their present records. Great pains have been taken to provide a good track on the site which has been the scene of many an exciting race on wheels in days long gone by.

A singular case, affecting race-track ethics, is reported from Syracuse. A horse named Bel Bel, 2:19¼, by Stamboul, out of Mabel by the Moor, six years, and bred in this State, died shortly after trotting in a race. Before the last heat the owner had asked the sanction of the judges for his withdrawal, the horse, according to his statement, being sick. After examination of the animal this was refused, the public having made him a strong favorite. The owner has expressed his intention of taking action against the Syracuse track association to recover the value of his horse, for which he paid $2,000 just previously and had received, he stated, an offer of $5,000 from Mr. James Gordon Bennett, since the stallion made his record a week previously.

BENEDICT.

The cause of amateur sport on the Pacific Coast is receiving attention that would appear to be better directed than has been the case for some considerable time past. The trend of affairs at present is in favor of cohesion with the Amateur Athletic Union of the United States, although recent definite action has not been in that direction, it having been only recently contemplated to form an independent association for the Pacific States. Wiser counsels, however, have prevailed, and while there are certain matters from the local point of view that need adjustment to give a proper representative character to the Amateur Athletic Union, the promoters of the proposed new organization are now in search of a harmonious basis and ultimate affiliation with the A. A. U. A. circular reviewing the situation, suggesting the steps to be taken and calling a meeting of all interested to be held at the Olympic Club on Friday next at 8 P. M, has been issued, and as part of its contents the signatories, Howard P. Taylor, Jr., the Olympic Club; J. J. Allen, The Acme Athletic Club; G E. Wentzel, Fresno Athletic Club, acting as a committee, have the following to say:

"It is the aim of the promoters of this movement to pursue a course which will have the effect of harmonizing conflicting elements, to the end that all amateur organizations on the Pacific Coast shall be brought together under one local organization, which will eventually be under the jurisdiction of and in genuine touch and sympathy with, the parent authority on the Atlantic seaboard.

"The promoters of this movement appreciate fully the necessity for having amateur athletics under the discipline and control of one properly constituted national authority, with geographical branches, so as to facilitate the conduct of its affairs. This national authority, in order to exert a proper influence, and invest its awards with a true importance, should be supreme in all matters relating to organization, qualifications, records and the like."

If the question be dealt with in this spirit amateur athletics throughout the country will be greatly benefited. Sectionalism means encouragement to professionalism, the chief bane of sport of the best class, which is always for the sake of honor and not for pecuniary profit.

THE HEROINE

Her raiment changes with the fleeting fashions
Of years that pass, but she abides in sooth
Unchanged, the star and shrine of human passions,
Or wise and old, or sweet in flowerlike youth.

Naomi she, the veiled and bent with sorrows,
Or clear-eyed Ruth, or Dido famed and fair,
Helen the beautiful, of dim to-morrows,
Or sad Elaine, slain by her lover's despair.

She trails her soundless garments down the ages,
A vision and a dream, or rustling steals
Past trembling arras in those haunted pages
Where man forever fights and woman kneels.

Our modern books and pictures often show her
Serene and college-bred and trimly gowned,
But able yet to make for all who know her
This queer old world one vast enchanted ground.

To bind and loose, this still remains her mission,
To loose and bind;—whatever be her name,
Her date, from Homer down, or her condition,
The heroine herself abides the same.

—Margaret E. Sangster, in Harper's Magazine.

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

Thackery, on the occasion of his visit to Boston, brought over a letter of introduction to an important resident of Beacon street, and through this gentleman's kindness, met many of the Beacon street set. However, being interested in Boston's eminent men, he was desirous of hearing Theodore Parker. But his host would not accompany him to Music Hall, where this divine preached, and so Thackery attended, alone, a funeral at which Parker was to deliver the address. That evening at dinner several members of the swellest and smartest families were present, and to them Thackery remarked how the sermon and audience had impressed him. His host was visibly distressed, and presently whispered in his ear, "I beg of you to remember that Mr. Parker does not belong to our best society!" This was more than the Englishman could stand, and he replied, "Upon my word, I begin to wish I hadn't got into good society when I came to Boston!"

A certain young lawyer in an interior town, who loved to indulge in flights of eloquence beyond the comprehension of his jury, was defending a railroad corporation which had been sued for damages. "You see, gentlemen," he said, complacently, addressing the jury, "I have the plaintiff in a very nice dilemma. If he went there, seeing the place was dangerous, there was contributory negligence, and as his Honor will tell you, he can't recover. If he did not see it was dangerous, neither could my client have seen it, and there was no negligence on his part. In either case I am entitled to your verdict." The jury retired. "Well, gentlemen," said the foreman, "I think we must give him $900." All agreed except a stout gentleman in the corner, who cried hoarsely, "Give him another $100 gentlemen, for getting into the dilemma." Verdict accordingly.

Jay Gould was distinguished for the promptitude with which he undertook large enterprises. The Western Union had got into a cable war, and it was necessary to double the service. No sooner had he decided than he telegraphed to Messrs. Siemens of London, "Cable estimate for making and laying two Atlantic cables." The firm immediately quoted their price, the amount considerably exceeding one million pounds. "Accept offer. Will buy Faraday," instantly responded the Napoleon of finance. But there are many things that even a millionaire cannot buy, among these being the cable-laying steamer Faraday! However, Jay Gould, restraining his acquisitive ardor, cabled, "Make and lay two cables. Fifty thousand pounds deposited at your bankers'." The cables were promptly made and laid.

Dr. Lasker, the chess champion, while in London frequents a certain restaurant that is the headquarters of English chess devotees. One evening a fussy old gentleman offered to play him for a box of cigars if conceded the odds of a queen. The offer was accepted; Lasker won and became the owner of a box of doubtful-looking cheroots, which the loser declared were first-rate. On his return to London after defeating Dr. Steinitz for the championship, Lasker went to the restaurant and his former opponent inquired about the cigars. "First-rate!" replied the champion; "in fact, I might almost say they won me the match." "Indeed! I am delighted to hear it!" returned the old gentleman. "Yes," continued Lasker, "I gave them all to Steinitz!"

An old farmer visiting London, was caught in a shower which came after a time of terrible drought. Whilst walking along, in utter disregard of downpour, he caught sight of a man crouching in a doorway. "Wh'ar' you doing there?" thundered the farmer in a voice of authority. "Trying to keep out of the rain—what d'you suppose?" answered the man. "What?" shouted the irate countryman, "have you so little patriotism? Don't you know this rain is worth a thousand guineas a second to the country? Come out and let it beat on you as I do. Come out and, for once, try and grow above yourself. Come out and be a crop!"

The minister was illustrating the omnipotence of God by showing that the least as well as the greatest of things had been created by him. "Just think," said the minister, when God made the mountains He made the little rills; when God made the mighty behemoth He made the sparrow, and when God made me He made a daisy."

WHEAT VALUES AND SILVER.

As time wears on and current events develop cold, hard facts that practically crush the life out of the silver advocate's theory, it is not a bad plan to turn down a leaf or make a memorandum so that we may remember the circumstances hereafter.

We are all familiar with the attempt the white metal advocate made during the campaign to hitch silver and wheat into a tandem team, and are equally familiar with the insistent manner in which he claimed that the decline of wheat values was due alone to the demonetization and consequent decline of silver. The advocate of sound money stoutly maintained that over-production had accomplished the undoing of wheat values. He pointed to the great areas in India, Russia and Argentina that were now producing wheat in vast and hitherto unheard of quantities, upon cheap land by means of still cheaper labor, and he cited this increased output to sustain his claim of over-production. To the advocate of sound money this answer was complete and undeniable, but he had no means of proving his position. The silver theorist scouted the idea of over-production, characterized the argument as rank, abominable nonsense, unworthy of a monment's consideration by honest and fair-minded men. His argument ran to the effect that there was no over-production of silver, and its consequent decline had driven wheat and every other commodity down to a point where beggary and pauperism leered and grinned at the man whose toil was to produce.

If it had been possible for the sound-money advocate to have suspended the production of wheat in any one of the great wheat-producing countries that had newly come into competition with our farmer, he might have proved his point, and demonstrated that with diminished production wheat values would be restored. This fact was impossible to man, but nature stepped in just before the close of the campaign, and inflicted a drought on misfortunate India. Rain fell not, and the blistering sun withered and burnt the blades of grass that were soon to be topped with tassels of wheat, and Famine, gaunt and grey, stalked through the land. Immediately the markets of the world began to throb, wheat values trembled, then bounded upward and upward, and strangely enough the tandem team parted company. While wheat went upward, silver dashed downward. The silver advocate's theory was exploded. Although he attempted to create the impression that "it was all a trick of Mark Hanna and the gold-bugs, who had made a corner in wheat to fool the farmer," it was too late for such tactics.

So much for the past. The market reports of to-day become interesting again in this connection.

"Silver," says one report, "is steadily declining in value. It has now reached the lowest figure ever known in the world's history."

"Wheat is booming," says another report; "it is still ascending with promise of still higher prices."

A great law of trade, as irresistible as the tides, is moving forward, and is again giving flat and indisputable contradiction to the ingeniously contrived theories of the silver man. It gives that contradiction in terms more forcible than mere words or voluminous statistics.

Discussing this contrary condition with one of the members of the late Senate Silver Committee, who was honestly and unselfishly an advocate of free coinage, he said:

"The present conditions do not disturb our theory. Cut off from the world's market one-half the product of the world on any given commodity and necessarily its value must increase. That is what is the matter with wheat. Drought, famine and disaster have reduced the world's crop to such an extent that of course wheat must rise. It has nothing to do with the silver question."

But it most emphatically has something to do with the silver question, inasmuch as it destroys the silver-wheat theory. It proves—if it proves anything—that it was over-production that affected wheat and it sustains the claim that over-production has bred the mischief in the prices of all other staples. The silver man strenuously denies that over-production had anything to do with declining wheat values, yet the very moment that production is diminished in even a single one of the new wheat-raising countries, up bounds the market value of that staple. Destroy the wheat-producing power of Argentina and Russia to-day, and on the morrow the value will bound again and again until a price is reached higher than the world has ever known, while silver might at the same time drop to a parity with copper.

"Cut off from the world's market one-half the product of the world on any given commodity," says our silver friend, "and necessarily its value must increase," and double the world's product on any given commodity and necessarily its value must diminish. That is precisely what happened to wheat. The drought in India amounts to a temporary and partial restoration of the conditions that existed when wheat was high. It was not a drought in those days; it was non-production, because of neglected development; to-day it is non-production because of a natural or unnatural climatic condition.

Let the silver man turn this question over in his mind, and come back with a better excuse or admit his error. He is shifty in argument and ingenious as well, but he must not dodge facts.

THE COAL-MINERS' STRIKE.

The preliminary symptoms of failure have for some time now been perceptible in the condition of the great coal miners' strike in Ohio, West Virginia and Pennsylvania. Samples of violence and threats of more have been exhibited, appeals are heard for contributions toward the support of the strikers, the bogie of the boycott has been invoked and appeals are made for sympathetic strikes of men engaged in other branches of industry who have no part or lot in the quarrel between the striking miners and their employers. The garrulous Debs, setting aside for the moment his magnificent scheme for turning the State of Washington into a socialistic colony, has hastened to the arena of talk, with his jaw in good working order, to resume his disastrous warfare against the capitalistic oppressors of labor. It is only a few weeks, to be sure, since the versatile Debs expressed, at Chicago, his belief, founded on his own experience as a well-paid leader of "organized labor," that the Lords of Capital were too strongly entrenched in their positions and possessions to be expelled by any possible assault of any possible combination of wage earners. But Debs appears to find no difficulty in setting aside that conviction when a new opportunity is presented of enjoying the delights of publicity and unlimited talk.

There is no doubt that the lot of the striking miners is a hard one, and that they have suffered many grievances from which they ought to be relieved. They complain that they are paid for their labor in orders on company stores instead of cash, that payments are unreasonably deferred, and that they are subject to extortionate rents for poor accommodations in company houses. Men who are so stupid and so improvident as to sink into such a condition of life can hardly be expected by their own efforts to throw off the yoke of which they complain. Instead of fighting one grievance at a time, and gradually wresting from their employers the conditions under which they could live with comfort, they break out in a wild effort to remodel at once all the conditions of the industry which gives them such employment as they have. Their intelligence and their resources are alike inadequate to such an undertaking. They rage indiscriminately against the good employers and the bad. It should not be forgotten that the present strike is made against a rate of wages which was established by the representatives of the miners in agreement with the coal operators. The rate agreed on was a reduction of previous rates paid. Yet the strikers regard as their bitterest enemy an operator who has voluntarily maintained the higher rate of wages previously allowed, who has always paid wages in cash at intervals of two weeks, and who has never maintained a company store. Men who are capable of waging industrial warfare in such stupid fashion must be content with very small chances of success. And when such men are found to be willing to listen to the discredited Debs and to look up to him as a leader their chances of victory in the struggle may safely be set down as less than any assignable quantity.

TROOPS FOR ALASKA.

The military genius of the Secretary of War was vigorously exercised last week, by wire, over a project for sending two companies of infantry to Alaska to garrison Circle City. Why the discovery of very rich deposits of gold in British territory made it necessary or desirable to send American troops to a place two hundred and fifty miles distant from the new diggings was not explained, probably because it had not been considered. But the War Department has few enough opportunities of attracting public attention by exhibitions of frantic energy in these dull times of protracted peace, and the Secretary was not inclined to let the opportunity afforded by the Klondyke excitement pass unimproved. So the wires were kept hot with orders and inquiries, and much readable copy was furnished for the press reports. Finally, whether because our military resources were found to be inadequate for the equipment and transportation of two companies for service in Alaska, or somebody in Washington waked up sober, the whole scheme was abandoned by direction of the President. The truth is that there is no more need for a garrison at Circle City, or anywhere else on the Yukon, than there is for a cavalry force on the Farallones. Soon after the territory of Alaska was acquired from Russia, and before much was known of the character of the country or of its native inhabitants, it was deemed necessary to send troops to take possession of some of the more important points in the region, and for a few years two or three scanty detachments languished at stations widely separated. They did nothing because there was nothing for them to do, and their efficiency as soldiers diminished necessarily because of their idleness, remoteness and isolation. When their uselessness had been thoroughly demonstrated they were withdrawn, and for more than twenty years there have been no garrisons in Alaska This experience ought to be sufficient. There is nothing more that soldiers can do, in the line of their duty, in Alaska now than there was thirty years ago. There is a general impression that the army can be relied on to preserve peace and order in new and wild countries and communities; but, while if they were permitted to do so our officers and men would undoubtedly prove their efficiency as a police force, their hands are tied by the laws which strictly forbid the use of any part of the army for the purpose of maintaining order and enforcing the law except in a very few specified cases, none of which is likely to arise in Alaska. They could afford no support to the Territorial government, even if any were needed, for the seat of that government is at Sitka, 2,000 miles from Circle City. There is no dispute as to the boundary line, nor any prospect of any misunderstanding about it. Troops cannot move through the country, and they would be powerless to suppress disturbances occurring anywhere except at their own station. The cost of sending troops so far and of supplying them in a country so destitute of resources and of means of transportation would be extravagant even if it were not purposeless. The great majority of the people who will be in Alaska and in the Klondyke during the coming winter will be American citizens, accustomed to governing themselves after a tolerably satisfactory fashion, and they will probably continue to do so even on Canadian soil. The Secretary of War will do well to keep our few soldiers where they can learn the duties for which they are maintained.

THE ARMOR DILEMMA.

The adjournment of Congress has left us with several battle-ships building and with no provision for providing their armor. As a battle-ship is quite as useless without armor as it would be without guns or engines, it is evident that the further increase of the fighting strength of the navy will be delayed until Congress and the armor-producing companies come to terms, or till the Navy Department is placed in position to make its own armor.

When the work of rebuilding the navy was undertaken it was wisely determined by Congress that, as a measure of military prudence, a source of armor supply should be established in our own country. Under the assurance of large contracts on liberal terms for the supply of the armor needed for the earlier battle-ships and armored cruisers of the new navy two corporations went to the large expense of erecting plants capable of turning out armor plates of the required quality and dimensions. They were paid for the armor furnished under the earlier contracts $600 per ton, a rate so liberal that almost the whole cost of the armor making plants has been covered by the profits of the companies. It is very probable that the two companies might have continued in the enjoyment of their lucrative monopoly but for the exposure of frauds in the character of the armor furnished under some of the previous contracts, and the fact that one of the companies had contracted to furnish armor plates to the Russian government for $229 a ton. It is not probable that there was any profit earned from the Russian contract, which seems to have been entered into rather for the purpose of forcing the combination of European armor makers to recognize the American producers as an element in the trade. But the average Congressman will certainly question the propriety of such a motive, and he will refuse to continue to support by liberal appropriations manufacturers who furnish their products to a foreign government at little more than one-third of the price which they have asked and received from our own government for the same product. Having treated the American companies with great liberality, in order to be entirely independent of the foreign manufacturers, Congress now finds itself helplessly dependent on its favored proteges, who have taken advantage of their position to attempt to extort from the government what seems to be an unconscionable price for their product. Congress has made no threat to resort to a foreign market for the supply of armor for the ships now building, and, as one result of the Russian contract before referred to, any attempt to do so would probably be useless. After a careful investigation the Secretary of the Navy reported that the cost of producing armor was such that a price of $300 per ton would give the companies a liberal margin of profit, and Congress accordingly fixed that price as the limit to which the Secretary was authorized to go in making contracts for further supplies of armor. If the companies refused to make contracts on such terms the Secretary was directed to take the preliminary steps for the establishment of a plant in which the government could produce its own armor. The companies have refused to take contracts on the terms proposed, and it is certain now that the ships on the stocks must wait for their armor until Congress or the companies shall recede from their present position, or until the government can acquire a plant and turn out a sufficient supply from its own works. In any case the completion of the ships is certain to be delayed at a time when we may find ourselves in urgent need of their services. This condition of things is deplorable, of course, but it would be still more deplorable to leave a great branch of the public service helpless in the hands of a greedy monopoly. No pity will be wasted on the companies if, by their stubborn rapacity they shall succeed in destroying the profitable market which they have hitherto enjoyed. It is not to be expected that armor can be produced in a government establishment as cheaply as in private works, but if the cost of production is to bear no relation to the cost to the government, as has been the case heretofore, there may be a great saving to the treasury, after all, if the Navy Department is enabled to produce its own armor, as it has long and successfully produced its own guns.

THE TARIFF ON COAL.

There is one feature of the new tariff which can work nothing but injury to San Francisco, and that is the increased duty on coal. If our city is ever to be a center of manufactures for the coast the source of power must be kept at a minimum of cost. If the energy of the tides and the waves of the sea could be harnessed to the shafts of factories we could afford to be careless of the cost of fuel, but any such mechanical development can be looked for only in the distant future. The water power furnished by the streams of the Sierra is too remote to be turned into electric current and transmitted to us at tide water with any economy. We must depend on coal as the source of energy for any manufacturing industries that we may hope to develop, and every addition to the cost of our fuel means a corresponding restraint on our growth in manufactures. There is not a ton of coal in California that is worth a cent of protection. The product of the mines of Oregon and Washington is so inferior that it is not used in our own naval vessels. We depend for our supply of steam-coal on the mines of Vancouver Island and the supply brought from Australia and from the United Kingdom by the ships which come to carry away our wheat crop. Under the old McKinley tariff seventy-five per cent. of all the duties collected on imported coal in the United States was paid here in San Francisco, and the only result was to increase the expense of running every steam engine in the State that did not burn wood under its boiler and to add to the cost of every manufactured article that was turned out by the aid of steam power. It may be highly desirable that the mill owners of New England shall not be at liberty to buy their coal from the mines of Nova Scotia, and the wool growers and sawmill owners of California may be materially benefitted by the Dingley tariff act; but the people of San Francisco may find those results too dearly purchased if they are secured at the expense of the city's growth in manufacturing industries.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

It is long since collegiate circles have been so aroused as of late over Professor Bradley's action in the matter of accredited schools. To the uninformed it may be necessary to say that it is the custom to accredit a large number of the better class of high schools and advanced preparatory schools throughout the State so that pupils graduating there may enter the State University without examination. The list of accredited schools is prepared with great caution and conservatism, a committee of examination from the faculty personally inspecting their status once every year. The standing of the schools thus accredited has never been questioned, and their pupils have in almost every case done good work at the U. C. Professor Gayley, the head of the English department of the colleges at Berkeley, has been chairman of this committee, and his judgment in the matter has been relied upon. During Gayley's absence in London, however, Professor Bradley, his assistant, had the matter in charge, and with ill-timed and deplorable haste has summarily discredited half the schools upon the list, including such high standing institutions as Miss West's Seminary and the Lowell High School of this city. The Lowell High School, by the way, is so thorough in its preparatory work that it is no unusual occurrence for pupils in its second year to pass the college matriculation examination with ease. Professor Bradley is not at the head of his department at Berkeley, and in taking the foolish step that has aroused such criticism was acting without any authority from Professor Gayley, and, in fact, seems to have consulted no one but himself. It is preposterous to suppose that he was warranted in discrediting so large a number, if indeed any, of the schools upon his proscription list. Such action, if coming from Professor Gayley, or even from PresidentKellogg, would have been a matter for grave consideration. Emanating from an assistant, whose work has been largely the preparation of under-class men for advanced senior work and whom accident had "dressed in a little brief authority," it is a matter deeply to be regretted. One asks who is this Professor Bradley, and what has he done that he should assume such responsibility? As yet there seems to be no satisfactory answer to such questions.

Already the terminal port for lines of steamers trading between the western coast of America and Australia, Oriental, Central and North American sea ports, the day seems not far distant when San Francisco will have regular communication across the Pacific Ocean with the Russian port of Vladivostock in Northeastern Asia. Passing through here only recently, Kir Alexeieff, representing the Russian Minister of Finance on a mission to Corea, and his assistant, Lieutenant Garfield, revealed something of the plans that are in progress for the establishing of a line of powerful ocean steamers between the Siberian port and this city. Although it is contemplated to inaugurate the service before the great trans-Siberian railway reaches Vladivostock, the full effect of the proposed new connection will not become apparent until that gigantic railway undertaking is in full operation. It will then be possible to travel hence by steamer to Vladivostock in about fifteen days and continue a journey to Europe by the Siberian railroad, reaching St. Petersburg in another twelve days. Inasmuch as the port of Vladivostock is closed in winter, however, the Russian Government are seeking an outlet through an open port to the south with which to connect their railway line. The Corean peninsula possesses several good natural harbors, which would no doubt meet the requirements of Russia, but existing treaties stand in the way of such an arrangement. Probably the wiles of diplomacy are to be brought to bear in that region, with a view to further developments in the required direction.

It would appear that the barren charms of the Klondyke are not all for veteran prospectors and seasoned gold hunters. The latest notable accessions to the army of argonauts who are rushing northward are from the ranks of the younger club and society men of this city. W. H. Fairbanks, M. S. Latham and S. F. Pond have the fever bad and have gone to Alaska to allay it, it may be in the snow and ice of the Yukon and its tributaries. Mr. Pond is the son of the ex-Mayor, Mr. Fairbanks father is the secretary of the Golden Milling Company of Petaluma, while Milton Latham is as well known as any club man in San Francisco, and moreover is secretary of the Olympic Club. The party is perhaps better equipped than any that has hitherto left for the north, their outfit including horses, burros and mules, provisions for two years and a twenty-eight foot boat with masts and sails. The trio will not attempt to locate any claims in the neighborhood of Dawson, but intednd to push on further into the country and try their luck upon the banks of the Stewart river.

Mr. Claus Spreckels continues to devote his energies to the extension of his beet sugar interests in this State, and is now busily occupied in plans for developing the industry in the neighborhood of Salinas. For the works now in course of construction in that locality a large consignment of the most approved European machinery has recently been landed, at a cost, with duty paid, of some $120,000; and it is understood that, when the material is in position, it will represent the most modern and efficient plant available for the manufacture of beet sugar. At the same time Mr. Spreckels is giving encouragement to the proposals that have been made in connection with the work of the Salvation Army, to establish a colony on the well known El Sobrante ranch, near Salinas, lately purchased by him. The plans that have been made with this object are said to be receiving the active support of certain citizens, who are willing to afford financial help; and, if the matter be brought to a satisfactory conclusion on their side, it is understood that Mr. Spreckels is prepared to place the entire ranch at their disposal for purposes of settlement and beet culture, the produce to be turned into his factory on terms that will afford the growers a fair return for their labor. This is practical charity of the best possible kind.

The new Collector of Internal Revenue, John C. Lynch, of San Bernardino, is possessed in considerable measure both of executive ability and political astuteness. He has managed most successfully the affairs of the Cucamonga Fruit and Land Co. in San Bernardino, and has also represented that county in the California Legislature during the sessions of 1891, 1893, and 1895, acting at the latter session as Speaker of the Assembly—a role he filled with signal success. He had the Republican complimentary nomination for Lieutenant-Governor in '96, and had the active support of Senator Perkins for the office to which President McKinley has just appointed him. He enters the service of the government free from entangling alliances, and can hardly fail to have a successful administration. Otherwise Collector Lynch is a native of Ohio, is a graduate of the Law Department of the Chicago University, and has served as Assistant State Engineer of St. Louis.

Judge I. B. Dudley, the new Minister to Peru, hails from San Diego, is a lawyer by profession, graduated from Kenyon College, Ohio, and is otherwise a young, driving and capable man who will undoubtedly make a career for himself. He has been a school teacher, a police judge, and had a considerable law practice in the town of his adoption when selected by the President for the Peruvian mission. Judge Dudley is a man of striking physique—tall, dark, broad-shouldered, of agreeable manner and quick intelligence, who undoubtedly has it in him to foster the relations of the South American republic and the Pacific Coast.

BOSWELL JR.

Kaiser William has expressed some concern that the United States should show an inclination to take an interest in the affairs of nations, and has spoken of the tendency as the "American peril." His meaning is taken to be that the well-being of this country is imperiled by interference in international politics, and possibly, judging by his own experience in such matters, he is a competent adviser on the point. His own penchant that way has more than once been regarded at home and abroad as a "German peril."

TRAVELING TO THE KLONDYKE

THE RUSH FOR GOLD

Storming the Regions of the North — The Incas Story Revamped.

Already it begins to look as if little will be lost in the long run by those who decide to await further developments before setting out for the northwestern gold fields. In the eager rush two points seem to have been overlooked to a great extent, first that all the ground where the rich strikes have been made has been taken up, and secondly that the Yukon river district is of immense extent. A vast number of people, for the most part inexperienced and unfitted for the task before them, have started out from the Pacific Coast ports, bound for the Klondyke, and there is great cause to fear that of these very many will find themselves unable from various causes to reach the goal. The passes which have to be negotiated, after leaving Juneau and Dyea, will have to be encountered for the most part without assistance, as there are not enough Indians to go round; and the travelers will find themselves unable to pack all their own supplies, without which they will be in danger of starvation later on. A few sketches are given with this issue illustrating the methods of transportation en route. Those who make the journey to Dawson City by ocean and river steamers will probably be safe enough, though some of the expeditions may be too late in setting out to escape the ice. This is sure to entail much hardship.

In the meantime there is evidently much to be learnt as to the best means of getting into the country. It is credibly reported that the Canadian Government are actively moving to facilitate the approaches from their side, and probably by the time spring travel begins, with the countless thousands that are sure to be coming from all parts of the world to the new El Dorado, there will be a choice of several routes free from many of the existing drawbacks. The steamship accommodation is also likely to improve greatly, as there has so far been no time to put on services to meet the requirements of large crowds.

Such further reports as have come to hand during the past week have only tended to confirm the good opinion already formed as to the gold-bearing qualities of the Yukon district, and it only remains for some satisfactory account from those who are prospecting for quartz veins to give a fresh impetus to the present excitement, and lead to wealthy capitalists taking a hand in developing the country. That the whole Yukon district abounds in gold seems certain, and it is only reasonable to conclude that as great riches lie in Alaskan territory, as in British Columbia. This, however, has yet to be proved.

In the meantime it would not seem that there is much to be gained by raising objections to the enforcement by Canada of the customs regulations, on the border being crossed. A good deal that is very wide of the mark has also been said about certain new regulations, which the Dominion Government have decided upon with regard to the Klondyke region. Proper official announcements are wanting, however, and pending their issue, it is, of course, doubtful how matters stand. People on the spot will doubtless find it to their interest to obey the law or go away, so making room for those who are better advised.

Local newspapers have commissioned a large number of correspondents to supply reliable information with regard to the gold fields, and even the present abundance of space devoted to the subject will no doubt shortly be far exceeded. That the rush to that part of the world and the excited interest the wonderful finds of gold in the Klondyke have caused will grow any less for some time to come is not to be expected. Level heads are likely to be at a considerable premium, if one may judge by the many who are prepared to abandon everything to increase their fortunes by a lucky find.

During the next three or four months information should be available which will admit of a calm judgment being formed as to the opportunities for the miner and the business man, who have spare capital to employ, and also for those to whom existence means work; while the risks and disadvantages which are at present lost sight of to a great extent in the general excitement caused by individual successes, can at the same time be properly estimated.

Within the last few days some wonderful stories have been dished up in local journals regarding the riches of Peru, and the great finds of gold that are to be made there bringing to the recollection of the writer how several years ago he perused a mass of authentic printed reports in the office of an eminent mining engineer not 100 miles from the Mansion House station of the underground railway in London, setting forth in elaborate detail the existence of the Incas' treasures. These reports were obtained quite a number of years back, and many a craze the wealth they describe has since caused. But the treasures are there still and the work of bringing them to hand remains to be done. Let the hint serve the mining enthusiasts, for the most part of little or no experience, whose eyes are now centered on the Arctic region. That few now going forth will be lucky and that many will be ruined body and soul is unfortunately what all experience teaches. G. I

The returns of revenue collected for the first ten months of the present Spanish financial year are unusually satisfactory, the estimate having been exceeded by $2,675,000, while there is an increase of $6,000,000 as compared with the returns for the same period of the preceding year. The result has been to further enhance the improvement in the value of Spanish securities, which followed upon the change of Ministry.

The Queen of England is to have a new yacht built on the lines and about the size of an Atlantic liner. It will be 420 feet long, with only 50 feet beam, and fitted with powerful engines so as to have a good speed. While no expense will be spared in order to make the vessel the finest of her class afloat in her decorations and fittings, she will closely resemble her Majesty's present yacht, the Victoria and Albert.

"Boom"

BY FRANK NORRIS

San Diego, in Southern California, is the largest city in the world. If your geographies and guide-books and encyclopædias have told you otherwise, they have lied, or their authors have never seen San Diego. Why, San Diego is nearly twenty-five miles from end to end. Why, San Diego has more miles of sidewalk, more leagues of street railways, more measureless lengths of paved streets, more interminable systems of sewer-piping, than has London or Paris or even—even—even Chicago (and I who say so was born in Chicago, too!). There are statelier houses in San Diego than in any other "of the world's great centres," more spacious avenues, more imposing business blocks, more delicious parks, more overpowering public buildings, the pavements are better laid, the electric lighting is more systematic, the railroad and transportation facilities more accomodating, the climate is better than the Riviera, the days are longer, the nights shorter, the men finer, the women prettier, the theatres more attractive, the restaurants cheaper, the wines more sparkling, "business opportunities" lie in wait for the unfortunate at dark street-corners and fly at his throat till he must fain fight them off. Life is one long, glad fermentation. There is no darkness in San Diego, nor any more night.

Incidentally corner lots are desirable.

All of this must be so, because you may read it in the green and gold prospectus of the San Diego Land and Improvement Company (consolidated), sent free on application—that is, at one time during the boom it was sent free—but the edition is out of print now, and can only be seen in the collection of bibliophiles and wealthy amateurs, and the boom is only an echo now. But when the guests of the big Coronado Hotel over on the island come across to the main land and course jackrabbits with greyhounds in the country to the north of the town, their horses' hoofs, as they plunge through the sagebrush and tar weed, will sometimes slide and clatter upon a bit of concrete sidewalk, half sunk of its own weight into the sand; or the jack will be started in a low square of bricks, such as is built for frame house foundations, and which make excellent jumping for the horses. There is a colony of rattlers on the shores of a marsh to the southwest (the maps call it Amethyst Lake) and the little half-breed Indians catch the tarantulas and horned toads that you buy alive in glass jars on the hotel veranda near the postoffice site, and everything is very gay and pleasant and picturesque.

Why I remember it all so well is because I found Steele in this place. You see, Steele was a very good friend of mine though he was Oxon, and I only a man from Chicago. When his wife knew I was coming west she gave me Steele's address, and told me I was to look him up. Since she told me this with much insistence and reiteration and with tears in her voice, I made it a point to be particular. She had not heard from Steele in two years. The address she gave me was "Hon. Ralph Truax-Steele, Elmwood avenue and One Hundred and Eighty-eighth street, San Diego, California."

When I arrived at San Diego I found it would be advisable to hire a horse, for 188th street, instead of waiting for the Elmwood Avenue electric car, and when I asked for directions a red-headed man whose father was Irish and whose mother was Chinese, offered to act as guide for twenty dollars. He said, though, he would furnish his own outfit. I demurred and he went away. I was told that some eight miles out beyond the range I would find a water-hole, and that if I held to the southwest after leaving this hole, keeping my horse's ears between the double peak of a distant mountain called Little Two Top, I would come after a while to a lamp post with a tarantula's nest where the lamp should have been. It would be hard to miss this lamp post, they told me, as the desert was very flat thereabouts, and the lamp post could be seen for a radius of ten miles. Also, there might be water there — the horse would smell it out if there was. Also, it was a good place to camp, because of a tiny ledge of shale outcropping there. I was to be particular about this lamp post, because it stood at the corner of Elmwood avenue and 188th street.

When I asked about the Hon. Truax-Steele, Oxon, information was less explicit. They shook their heads. One of them seemed to recollect a "shack" about a mile hitherward of Two Top, a statement that was at once contradicted by someone else. Might have been an old Digger "wicky-up." Sometimes the Indians camped in the valley on their way to ghost dances and tribal feasts. It wasn't a place for a white man to live, chiefly because the climate offered so many advantages and attractions to horned toads, tarantulas and rattlesnakes. Then the red-headed Chinese-Irishman came back and said, with an accent that was beyond all words, that a sheepherder had once told him of a loco-man out beyond McIntyre's waterhole, and another man said that, "Yes, that was so; he'd passed flasks with a loco-man out that way once last June, when he was out looking for a strayed pony. In fact, the loco-man lived out there, had a son, too, leastways a kid lived with him." This seemed encouraging. The Hon. Truax-Steele, Oxon, was accredited with a son—so his wife had said, who should know. So I started out, simultaneously hoping and dreading that the loco-man and the honorable Truax might be one flesh.

I left San Diego at four o'clock A. M. to avoid as much as possible the heat of mid-day, and just at sunset saw what might have been a cactus plant standing out stark and still on the white blur of sage and alkali like an exclamation point on a blank page. It was the lamp-post of the spider's nest that marked the intersection of Elmwood Avenue and 188th street. And then my horse shied, with his hind legs only, in the way good horses have, and Ralph Truax-Steele rose out of a dried muck-hole under the bit.

I had expected a madman, but his surprise and pleasure at seeing me were perfectly sane. After awhile he said: "Sorry, old boy. It's the hospitality of the Arab I can give you; nothing better. A handful of dates (we call 'em caned prunes out here), the dried flesh of a kid (Californian for jerked beef), and a mouthful of cold water, which the same we will thicken with forty-rod rye; incidentally, coffee, black and unsweet, and tobacco, which at one time I should have requested my undergroom to discontinue."

We went to his "shack" (I observed it to be built of discarded bricks, mortared with 'dobe mud) and I was made acquainted with his boy, Carrington Truax-Steele, fitting for Oxford under tutelage of his father.

We had supper, after which the Hon. Truax, Sr., stood forth under the kindling glory of that desert twilight by that incongruous, reeling lamp-post, booted, bare-headed and woolen-shirted, and to the low swinging scimitar of the new welded moon declaimed Creon's speech to Oedipus in sonorous Greek. When he was done he exclaimed, abruptly: "Come along, I'll show you 'round."

I looked about that stricken reach of alkali, and followed him wondering. That evening the Hon. Ralph Truax-Steele, Oxon, showed me his real estate and also, unwittingly, the disordered workings of his brain. The rest I guessed and afterwards confirmed.

Steele had gone mad over the real estate "boom" that had struck the town five years previously, when land was worth as many dollars as could cover it, and men and women fought with each other to buy lots around the water hole called Amethyst Lake. The "boom" had collapsed, and with it Steele's reason, for to him the boom was on the point of recommencing; sane enough on other points, in this direction the man's grip upon himself was gone for good.

"There," he said to me that evening as we crushed our way through the sagebrush, indicating a low roll on the desert surface, "there are my villa sites, here will run a driveway, and yonder where you see the skeleton of that steer I'm thinking of putting up a little rustic stone chapel."

"Ralph, Ralph," I said, "come out of this. Can't you see that the whole business is dead and done for long since? You're going back with me to God's country tomorrow—going back to your wife, you and the boy. She sent me to fetch you."

He stared at me wonderingly.

"Why, it's bound to come within a few days," he said. "Wait till next Wednesday, say, and you won't recognize this place. There'll be a rush here such as there was when Oklahoma was opened. We have everything for us—climate, temperature, water. Harry," he added in my ear, "look around you. You are standing on the site of one of the grandest, stateliest cities of civilization."

That night the boy Carrington and I sat late in consultation while Steele slept. "Nothing but force will do it," said the lad. "I know him well, and I've tried it again and again. It's no use any other way." So force it was.

How we got Steele back to San Diego I may not tell. Carrington is the only other person who knows, and I'm sure he will say nothing. But the singular part of the business occurred when Steele woke up, as it were, in the heart of a real city and began to look about him and take stock of his surroundings. For over a half-dozen years he had lived there on the desert in the midst of imaginary mirage-like edifices, seeing country seats in sand hillocks and rustic chapels in bleaching bones. But sound enough, mark you, on all other subjects. The collapse came—the real collapse—when Steele beheld the real city he had forgotten. He is in a sanitarium now somewhere in Illinois, and his wife and son see him on Wednesday and Sunday afternoons from two till five. Steele will never come out of that sanitarium, though he now realizes that his desert city was a myth, a creation of his own distorted wits. He's sound enough on that point, but a strange inversion has taken place. It is now upon all other subjects that he is insane.

THE ACADEMY'S MAMMOTH

Found in Siberia After Fifteen Thousand Years on Ice.

In the year 1798 the spring freshets loosened a huge chunk of frozen earth on the banks of the Lena river in Siberia which broke off cleanly and left to view, imbedded in the bank, the body of an eleiphant, or, as we call it, a mammoth, 16 feet high, 26 feet long, and covered with thick, brown hair. This mammoth had been killed in an earthquake about 15,000 years previously, so the scientists have made out, and had been buried beneath a mass of debris almost immediately afterward. Its flesh was frozen before it had time to decompose, and when brought to light again, nearly 15,000 years afterward, was still so fresh that it was quickly discovered and eaten by the bears and wolves of the vicinity. However, at the end of the last century an Englishman named Adams found all the bones, but those of one foot. A native ivory hunter had gone away with the tusks, which were never recovered. Nearly half a ton of the hide was left. It was quite two inches thick and of a toughness that would defy the most improved style of explosive bullet known to gunsmiths. Adams got his fossil to St. Petersburg, where it was set up in the Government Museum there, and its discoverer rewarded with 12,000 roubles. The mammoth in the Academy of Sciences in this city is modeled from this one of the St. Petersburg museum and from a second found in a railway cutting near Stuttgart. There is no guess work about the monster, his complete anatomy and general appearance has been exactly determined, and he stands there in the main hall of the Academy precisely as he looked on the day of the earthquake of 15,000 years ago when he was feeding along the banks of the Lena. The fact that he was so feeding at the spot proves that Siberia was in his time a tropical country. For to-day it would be impossible for him to make even a light dejeuner there, though he tramped the whole length of the Lena in search of it. Autre temps autre moeurs. It is just as well the big elephant died when he did.

The Academy of Sciences of this city caused a model of the great beast to be accurately constructed by Ward, the famous modeler of Rochester, Senator Leland Stanford and Charles Crocker meeting the expense. It is as good a model of the great beast as is possessed in any museum of the world, and the enormous ivory tusks are real.

'Falleth From Grace and Subsequently From a Springboard.

The other morning I went, rather early, to the "Lure-you-in" Baths for my accustomed plunge. It is really very pleasant to take a swim and a subsequent cup of coffee in this fashion before breakfast. There are but few in the baths at that hour, and the water is almost as fresh as at the beach. As I was coming out I bumped against Leander, who was just going in, dressed in a suit of pale salmon-pink, nearly flesh-colored, and quite flesh tight.

"Neptune rising from the waves," he exclaimed, with a grin.

"Venus going to the bath," I retaliated, staring significantly at his wondrous costume.

"Come, now—I say—really, you know," he exclaimed, all in a breath.

"Wake up!" said I, "it's morning." At this, just as the heroine does in novels, he started and passed his hand over his brow.

"I'm a bit absent-minded this morning," he pleaded.

"Huh!" I snorted; "I've often noticed that absence of mind."

Then Leander said two bad words, and I was fain to punch his head. After this (some time after) we sat down on the end of the springboard, and Leander unburdened himself of his trouble.

"Well," says he, "you see, it was like this——"

"There were two of us," I interrupted, "and the other was a girl."

"Well, as were saying," began Leander, "I called on this girl the other night, and——"

"Wait a minute. How well did you know her?"

"One dance, one tea, two functions, and a call."

"Oh, intimately, then. Remember, this is San Francisco. First name?"

"Yep—at the tea "

"Yours too?"

"Of course."

"Fancy calling a man 'Leander'!"

"Shut up—she says 'Lee.' "

"Idyllic! and her's—what's her's?"

Leander drew himself up.

"Mr. Sturgis!" frostily.

But Leander could not be effective in that bathing-suit and with those dangling calves. Yet I apologized.

"I don't want to know her confounded name, then," said I; "but I thought you did not approve of this sort of thing, this—this—this too easy familiarity?"

"No more I do. But I told you I was in trouble."

"It seems to me we don't get far along in this story."

"Well, I called on this girl."

"You've said that three times. Did she let the maid open the door?"

"No, she opened it herself."

"I thought so. Well, now, we're inside the house. Do we go into the parlor."

"Nope—small reception-room at back, one lamp, one chair——"

"What?"

"Wait till I finish—one sofa——"

"Ah, sofa!"

"One——"

"The rest of the inventory is immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent. The stage is set for a drama. Was it comedy?"

"Tragedy!" said Leander in sepulchral tones.

"One thing more—had the girl come 'out'?"

"She had—rather far. However, her 'position is assured.' "

"Hum! But aren't you rather caddish, Leander, to tell me all this?"

"You don't know but what I'm lieing."

"I had forgotten that contingency."

"And it it don't apply to one case it applies to another?"

"True. Vorwartz!"

"Well, I shook hands with her, and——"

"Held her hand?"

"Um-hum."

"How long?"

"For twenty heart-beats," grinned Leander.

"Oh, a couple of seconds, then?"

"No; 'heart hadn't had time to get started that fast just yet." Say ten seconds. Then she sat down on the sofa, and I took a seat——"

"Where?"

"I say I took a seat."

"Where?"

"Well, I took a seat."

"On the chair?"

"Well—no."

"You said there was one chair in that small reception-room, and the sofa?"

"Um-hum."

"Get on with the story."

"That's what I did with the girl—famously."

"Let's see—the two of you are now sitting on the sofa. The girl is on which side of you?"

"Hum! Leander, where is your left elbow?"

Leander grinned.

"It is resting on the back of the sofa, and I am holding my head with my left hand."

"Of course—and then?"

"Then—if ye have tears, prepare to shed them now—then the lamp began to go out."

I gasped.

"I offered," continued Leander, "to turn on the current, but she——"

"Said she loved to sit in the twilight."

"Now, how did you know that?"

"Guessed it."

"So we sat——"

"On the sofa."

"In the twilight."

"With your elbow on the back of the sofa; then?"

"Well, then, after a while I—I (Leander coughed slightly and crossed his legs) I let my left hand fall, straight.

"Along the sofa-back?"

"Yes."

"Behind the girl?"

"And she?"

"Never noticed—pretended not to, I mean—and then I moved an eighth of an inch closer, and—well, it was twilight and she was pretty and never noticed—and—and—then—I don't know how it happened, but somehow—confound it, you know the blooming lamp was out and a fellow's only a man, y'know, after all, and I—so I—well, I——"

"Leander," said I, in hollow tones, "Leander, you—kissed—that—girl."

Leander covered his face with his hands.

"Well, that's a sad case," said I. Leander became animated at once.

"Hoh! You think that's all. The worst is yet to come."

I made as if to fly. Leander caught and pulled me down.

"You misunderstand," he said, severely; "what do you suppose the girl did?"

"Pretended not to notice," I suggested.

"No," wailed Leander; "no, no! she jumped up as if worked by a spring, an' shook all over an' began to cry. I say, she did, an' said I was no gentleman, an' how dared I take such a liberty with her, an' no man had ever kissed her before, an' wasn't I ashamed of myself, an'-I-don't-know-what-all-else. Yes, she did, and there I sat like a lump on a log, an'—well, that's all, an' I've felt as cheap as six bits ever since. Oh, Lord! what a fool a man is! That I should make such a break—I—I" (he smote his salmon-pink breast) "I of all men who have preached—but this settles it for good and all."

"Here endeth the first lesson," said I. "But the girl was to blame. She's no one to thank but herself. You needn't cut up rough, Leander."

"The girl!" said Leander, blankly.

"Think it over now. This was only your second call. She allowed you to treat her with a certain amount of familiarity, opened the door for you herself, saw you alone and not in the parlor, called you—good Lord!—called you 'Leander'!"

"Lee," murmured Leander.

"——let you use her first name, let you hold her hand, never stopped or discouraged your little advances from chair to sofa, and from sofa to sofa-back, and so on; gave you every reason to suppose that you might kiss her without fear and without reproach, and then, when you had——"

"It was awful the way she went on — actually cried!"

"I'm not in the least sorry for her. She was entirely to blame. You were just a beastly natural-born man, acting according to your lights. I'm afraid even the best of us, under similar circumstances——"

"Why, what a muff you'd be not to," shouted Leander.

"All good girls draw their line somewhere, only some draw it later than others—this girl drew her's too late."

"When should she have drawn it, or where?"

"Between the chair and that sofa."

There was a pause:

"Look here," exclaimed Leander, turning upon me fiercely, "look here, you mealy-mouthed old grandma, what would you have done, if you had been there? Remember the girl was pretty as one o'clock."

I drew myself up proudly (my bathing-suit was sombre black).

"Ah, yah!" exclaimed Leander (whether he misunderstood me or not, judge you) "you're too good, Just. There's such a thing as being too rotten good. Do you know what I heard a girl say the other day, Just.? 'Look here,' she said, 'you know that Sturgis man. He's like Aristides. I'm sick of hearing him called the Just'."

There was only one thing to do at such a crisis. I did it. I pushed Leander into the water. His yell was drowned in a liquid gurgle, and the salmon-pink silk bathing suit disappeared beneath the brown waters of the "Lure-you-in" Baths as Leander sank from sight.

Avis au lecteur—He came up again.

The invasion of the cycle market in England by American manufacturers and dealers seems to have caused considerable stir. Unprejudiced observers seem to be of the opinion that the only way for the home product to maintain its ground is to reduce prices all around, as the foreign-made goods are fully equal to the former in quality, besides being cheaper. In all probability the net result will be the collapse of many of the over-capitalized bicycle manufacturing concerns which have been foisted upon the gullible British public during the last two or three years.

At recent book sales in London new records in prices have been made. At one sale in the last days of June Messrs. Sotheby & Co. realized $48,940 in a single day, some $10,000 more than had ever been made in one day before. The Guttenberg Bible, from the Ashburnham collection, which was purchased by Lord Ashburnham at the Perkins sale in 1873 for $17,000, sold for $20,000. This magnificently ornamented copy of the Scriptures is the first book printed from metal type. Several other highest prices on record were obtained at the same sale.

A CAT AND DOG LIFE

Leonidas, and His Views Upon the Members of His Troupe.

A man with a wife has his trials no doubt, and he who must depend upon the caprices of five cats for his bread and butter will find life full of variety, especially if he has some dozen dogs under foot at the same time. What, then, in Heaven's name shall we say of a man who mixes five cats with twelve dogs, has 'em all about his ears as one might say, day and night, and at the same time is married, and that to the strongest woman in the world. Also, he has a family, but this is a detail.

In the light of all this it is no wonder the individual in question has elected to call himself Leonidas. He must have foreseen that if he did not choose this name for himself some one else would. One could have wished, however, that he had omitted the "professor" before his stage name. "Professor" Leonidas suggests ideas that fight with one another, to say the least. Do you know, can you guess, what was the hardest piece of work that Leondias ever set himself to accomplish? Perhaps you have seen his dogs and cats do their turn at the Orpheum this week, and if you have you have no doubt marveled to see Max jump on Sultan's back, and Mimisse upon him, and Scott get between Sultan's forelegs and the whole quartet go waltzing off the stage. Maybe you think it was hard to teach them all this and other equally hard tricks. So it was, but the one thing that kept the Professor awake o' nights, the thing that brought the silver in his hair and the sweat to his temples, that caused him to weep tears of pure nervousness and exasperation, that drove him to repressed paroxysms of impatience and profanity was to get a cat to stay quiet upon a chair for an indefinite length of time.

"I could make a dog do it in a couple of days. Mimisse (this was the cat) finally made up her mind to do it towards the end of the fifth month."

I asked him if it was because of the greater intelligence of the dog.

"Contrariwise," says the Professor. "Believe me, of the two, the cat is by far the more intelligent."

"What then?"

"A cat has her nerves, and, besides, she is independent and, above all, capricious. The dog understands what you want after some little time and humors you good naturedly as if he should say, 'This poor devil has set his mind upon my jumping through this fool basket, so if it makes him any happier I'll do no it just because I like him. And I may get smacked if I don't."

PROF. LEONIDAS AND HIS HAPPY FAMILY

"And the cat?"

"The cat knows almost instantly what I want, and for just that one very particular reason makes up her mind that if she died for it she will not do that one very particular thing. 'And let him whack me,' 'says the cat, 'till he's black in the face and I'll only be so much more stubborn.'"

"The dog is the man, then," I suggested.

"And the cat the woman," filled in the Professor. "Precisely. You can reason with a dog, show him the plausibility of wicker cylinders, the logic of chair-backs, and the fine reasonableness of walking upon the hind legs, and you can give him a good cut with the whip to assist his intelligence; but a cat knows more about the cylinders and chair-backs and hind legs than you or I can ever teach her, and the knowledge makes her feel superior and dignified. So you must cajole and coax her into a condescending mood and induce her for a few moments to forget her self-respect."

"So you never whack the cats?"

'Never, never,' said the Profesor. "It's an insult they never forgive or forget. Ah, these cats, these cats," he continued, wagging his head at the happy family of felines nuzzling about a plate of meat. "They are quite the most interesting animal that lives. I know my dogs as well as my family. They have their characters, their little traits, their good points and their failings. You know just how they will act under certain circumstances. But the cat! There are depths in a cat's nature that a man never can reach. She is mysterious, self-contained, secretive, attending strictly to her own affairs and asking nothing more of me than to do the same. Have you ever noticed how a cat meditates? Give her food and a warm place to sleep in, and her own thoughts are all the company she needs. But the dog, now, h must have change, variety, excitement, lots of company he is emotional, impulsive, fond of amusement, and, b sides, is grateful for favors, where the cat merely tolerates your kindnesses, takes them as a matter of course in fact, would prefer you to keep your distance."

"Speaking of gratitude, wasn't there some litle story some litle legend conected with the cat Mimisse?"

The Professor told me the story—the legend—the romance. "At Paris it was, at the Pont de Jena there," and Mimisse, who belonged to a charcuterie, had tumbled into the Seine. Consternation! A crowd gathers Nagerat-elle, nagerat-elle pas? Oh, la, la! The charcutiere weeps in the background, raising her hands to Heaven. Tremendous excitement! Strong men weep and women faint. No one volunteers. Yes, there is some one. Cerberus will go, Cerberus the black dog of the boulanger, Cerberus will dare the foaming tide, throws off his coat, good-bye, good-bye, if I never come back, prier pour moi, dites a maman—, he chokes a sob—cheers houp-la, vive la Republique!

"Allons enfants de la Patrie
Le jour de gloire est arrive."

He leaps—splash—he is gone. Silence! The suspense becomes terrible. Then more cheers and more. Cerberus gains upon Mimisse, reaches her, grasps her by the scruff of the neck, turns shoreward, "battles with the tide," desperate struggle, strength failing—almost there, sinks—rises, one more effort, men run waist deep in the water to reach the hero, do reach him and Mimisse. Safe at last! Hourra! Men and women weep on one another's shoulders, Cerberus carried about in triumph, picture in "Le Petit Journal" next morning, silver collar, interviewed by reporters, hero of the hour. He and Mimisse go on the stage just like any prize-fighters or bridge-jumpers, for Leonidas hears the story, buys the pair and incorporates them in his troop. Virture is rewarded with deathless fame.

"And, of course, ever afterward the pair were inseparable friends—a canine Damon and a feminine Pythias. Beautiful legend."

"Not so," said the Professor, shattering an idol. "Mimisse never paid the least attention to him from that time to this."

FROM FIELD TO STOREHOUSE

How a Wheat Crop is Handled in California.

One man's loss is another man's gain, and the same is true of wheat-producing countries the world round. Early in the season, when the wheat was young, drought and prevailing hot winds so wrought upon the fields in Australia and in the Argentine Republic, two of the great wheat-growing countries of the world, that the crop failed completely. It was at one time feared that the same catastrophe was to befall California, but a few weeks' favorable weather has changed all that, and though the farmers and growers of the San Joaquin Valley have rejoiced in larger crops than that of this year, still the output is quite large enough for congratulation. At a rough estimate it is supposed that the California output of wheat for this year will reach, if it does not slightly exceed, the comfortable aggregate of eight hundred and fifty thousand tons. It is very often the custom of the California farmer to sell his wheat in advance, but the rise in prices began so early this year that the majority deemed it wise to hold off a little longer than usual, and in so doing were able to take advantage of the decided advance during the last month. There is no one particular class who benefits by the rise in the value of wheat. Everybody is financially better for it sooner or later. Of course, the farmer is the first to feel the effect. Then the broker, then the country stores, and thence the ripple of "better times" spreads and widens indefinitely to almost every sort and condition of business enterprise.

The crop is now being harvested throughout the State, and the railroads and the river boats that ply on the San Joaquin are hard put to it to handle the quantity of sacks that accumulate at every station and landing. Port Costa and San Francisco are the chief shipping points, and there the grain is distributed to all corners of the world but chiefly to Australia, the Argentine, Brazil, the United Kingdom and South Africa. It would be supposed that the famine would have caused an almost insatiable demand for grain throughout India, but the native population of India is a rice-consuming people, and the whaleback relief ship City of Everett carried almost the only important consignment of grain that has been shipped from this coast to Calcutta or other of the Indian ports.

In connection with the good wheat crop in the San Joaquin Valley, one must not forget to make mention of the giant harvester at work near Stockton. This harvester was made at Stockton and is at present harvesting the wheat on Robert's island, about twelve miles outside of the city. It is the largest harvester ever built, is of course propelled by steam, and cuts a swath of the tremendous width of fifty-four feet, w..e enough surely for the most ambitious farmer. It is quite worth the trip to Stockton to see this enormous engine at its work, rolling through the grain knee deep, as it were, like a feeding mammoth, its teeth clicking and clashing before it, its locomotive rumbling behind. It takes eight men to guide and control the monster, but it does the work of a little army. Before its passage the wheat is mere standing grain, yellowy and nodding in the summer sun; after it has passed the wheat is grain in sacks ready for shipment. The ordinary harvester is doing well when it cuts eight hundred sacks in a day, a thousand is something to tell of. But the giant of Roberts Island, with its fifty-four foot sweep, cuts, winnows and sacks its nineteen hundred sacks without exertion, clearing off at this rate nearly one hundred acres per day.

There is a rumbling sound of portent in the capital of the German empire. The fact of the matter is the Kaiser's little ways are irritating and have the effect of making the most loyal of his subjects too often thoroughly uncomfortable. Patriotism is a strong point in the German character, but under present conditions it is put to a test that is over-hard; and though the Prussian may bear with anything a Hohenzollern might do, the Bavarian and South German is apt to be less complaisant. The Emperor has of late been having serious differences with his people on the question of ways and means, and though the Reichstag with placid equanimity agreed to a ten million appropriation for special military purposes, just before its close, the requirements of the navy extension plans have not yet been provided for. Construction work, however, steadily proceeds, and whether the Emperor, who ordered it, is to pa- the piper, or the country is to adopt the expenditure, is a question for the future. Meantime radicalism of a good, sound, liberal type is evidently gaining strength, and there is little doubt that the next elections will produce the most democratic Reichstag ever assembled.

THE MORMON FESTIVAL

Semi-Centennial Celebration of the Utah Pioneers.

The semi-centennial celebration at Salt Lake City is an event deserving special notice. Under the auspices of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, the world has seen grow up during the last fifty years one of the most thriving communities on the face of the globe. Emerging from those conditions which rendered Mormonism a reproach to civilization, the settlement in Utah has attained to the dignity of statehood, together with a degree of material prosperity truly remarkable.

The blot of polygamy has been removed, and, strangely enough, woman suffrage has followed. The result is a state of things which may be a source of pride to Mormon and Gentile alike. Let us see how this has all come about.

Shortly before the middle of the present century the Mormon settlement in Illinois was forced to undergo a series of persecutions, ending in the destruction of their homes and temple by fire and the murder of their prophet, Joseph Smith. Impelled to action by these untoward events, and relying upon the revelation said to have been vouchsafed to a prominent member of their sect, Brigham Young, the Council of Twelve held a meeting on October 7, 1844, which resulted in his election as the "Lion of the Lord," and plans being formed for an expedition westward with a view to the settlement of their followers numbering 1,600 souls. Eventually starting on their way the pilgrims crossed the frozen Mississippi on February 3, 1846, and with much suffering and loss of life in passing over the desolate, trackless wastes of Iowa, the earlier arrivals reached the banks of the Missouri river, about the end of June. There the general body remained for a while, crossing the river in the fall and establishing themselves at the point where the city of Omaha now stands. Thus was formed the famous "winter quarters," where several thousand men, women and children were soon gathered together.

On April 14, 1847, the "Lion of the Lord," as Brigham Young is called by his people to this day, and eight apostles, with 143 picked men, three women and two children, together with seventy wagons, loaded with supplies, set out on their final march to spy out the promised land. Following the basin of the Platte they wended their way over the arid plains, harassed by Indians and enduring endless privations, but still with firm faith in their leader, who, bringing them safely across the Rockies, reached the summit of the Wasatch range, there to see laid out before him the spot which led him to exclaim, "This is the place I have seen in my visions!" Before their eyes rested the barren valley of Salt Lake, the Dead Sea of America, intersected by the river Jordan, as named by the Mormons, which, taking its rise in the snow-crowned heights of Mount Nebo, ends its course on the shore of the great salt-water inland sea.

Another day's journey into the valley brought the prophet to the spot whereon now stands the great Mormon Temple, and which he then chose, saying, "Here we will build the temple of our God."

After some few weeks' stay in the valley, spent in prospecting the land and making surveys with a view to the future Salt Lake City, Young returned, with a portion of his men, to "winter quarters," to make arrangements for the on-coming of the thousands awaiting his further direction. Without much loss of time the emigrants were once more on the move and the entire body of them, about 7,000 in number, reached the chosen valley towards the end of the fall of the same year, 1847. The settlement of the Saints being thus accomplished, all parts of the globe began steadily to contribute additions to the little world of Mormonism. Brigham Young, being satisfied that the new colony would prove successful, issued an address to believers everywhere, inviting all and sundry to come to the new Eden, the basis, religious and political, of the community being thus defined: "We simply ask you to do right, obey the law, and believe in God, and in return we will hail you as a brother and will be to you what you are to us. We intend to petition as soon as circumstances will permit for the formation of a territorial government in the great basin."

The colonists now took in hand the work of building a new city and transforming the desert into farms and orchards by means of irrigation systems. In the summer of 1848 came a plague of grasshoppers, which devoured the crops, blocked up the ditches, polluted the drinking water and sowed the seeds of fever. To avert all these misfortunes the saints prayed incessantly, and, according to tradition, their prayers were answered by the appearance of myriads of white gulls from the Great Salt Lake, which destroyed the insects and so partially saved the crops. The gulls have since been held in reverence by the Mormons, much as is the Ibis in Egypt and the "adjutant bird" by the natives of India. The following winter was one of scarcity and several of the colonists started out for California to seek a livelihood. Of the number—mark this—was James W. Marshall, who, when in the employment of General Sutter, digging the foundations of a sawmill on the banks of the American river, near Sacramento, found gold for the first time in this State. To the Mormon movement indirectly, therefore, was due the discovery which resulted in the opening up of California. Many of the immigrants hither subsequently returned to the colony with the stores of gold they had accumulated here.

Since those days the material progress of the settlement founded by Young and his followers has led to results probably far beyond the leader's wildest dreams, prolific as was his brain, to say nothing of his loins. Salt Lake City claims a population of 50,000, with scarce an indigent member in the whole; possesses a house of God that is one of the most striking in the world, and a house of Mammon, in the shape of a co-operative store and bank, that has no equal on this continent in regard to the magnitude of its operations, while the various Mormon institutions are all in a state of the highest prosperity.

To commemorate the achievements of the pioneers and to celebrate the successes which have followed the labors of the saints, the people of Utah began on July 20th a series of pageants and exercises which extended over several days. It would be impossible here to give a detailed description of all that was done and to be seen on the occasion, when some 50,000 visitors were present in Salt Lake City to witness the ceremonies. The first day was devoted to the dedication of the magnificent monument to Brigham Young, the reception of the surviving pioneers, 146 in number, at the Tabernacle, and a great concert of 1,000 voices in the same place in the evening Each of the surviving pioneers was presented with a medal and a basket of flowers, the oldest surviving of them all, Wilford Woodruff, President of the Mormon Church, and now 90 years old, being crowned with a laurel wreath by Ida Taylor Whitaker, a granddaughter of pioneers. The Director-General of the jubilee proceedings was Brigham Young, the oldest surviving son of Utah's founder. On the second day the "Pageantry of Progress" passed through the streets of the city and thereby were illustrated in striking manner the most conspicuous events in the history of the colony. An unique ceremony was performed, entitled "The Baptism of the Jordan," which consisted in mingling water taken from the Palestine river of that name with the water of the Jordan in Utah. Amongst the various processions was one specially devoted to children, the floats representing the subjects of their favorite fairy tales, and one in particular gotten up to display the sego lily, the State flower, which for beauty of design and effect was awarded the palm. The buildings of the city were briliantly illuminated every night, and the night parades likewise. The "Pageant of the Counties" of Utah was a representation of the varied resources and productions of the State. Great as these are at present, the showing evidenced that the possibilities of development, mineral, agricultural and animal, are simply immense. An important function towards the close of the entire proceedings was the raising of the memorial flag on Ensign Peak, where the Stars and Stripes was unfurled fifty years ago.

Mr. W. J. Soulsby, C. B., Secretary to the Lord Mayor of London, has furnished some interesting figures showing that the numerous Mansion House Funds from 1872 up to the end of 1896 had reached a total of $12,382,545. subscribed for the relief of distress and suffering in various parts of the world. Of this amount $3,996,765 was subscribed for the hospitals of London. In addition to these figures the sum of $2,700,000 has been received this year for the Indian Famine Relief fund.

The debate in the House of Commons on the report of the investigation committee on the Transvaal raid closed with an overwhelming vote against the motion characterizing the report as inconclusive and unsatisfactory in its failure to recommend the taking of specific steps for dealing with Mr. Cecil Rhodes. The necessity of depriving the late premier of Cape Colony of his position as a Privy Councillor was touched upon in the course of the debate, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer is reported to have admitted that the Government would have to consider the question. Mr. Chamberlain expressed the opinion that nothing had been shown to affect Mr. Rhodes' personal character as a man of honor. The direct outcome of the committee's labors will therefore be difficult to discover. At the same time the air has been considerably cleared and the Government is likely to leave less to chance in administering South African affairs than it has done hitherto. There is very litle doubt that the efforts of the committee to probe the entire matter were seriously hampered by the extravagant action of Mr. Labouchere as a member of the committee, and by his abuse of Parliamentary privilege. Mr. Rhodes will now be left in all likelihood to work out his own destiny, which doubtless includes the destiny of a great portion of the Dark Continent; and though his foster-child, the Chartered Company, may be made more amenable than it has hitherto been to Colonial Office authority, and in consequence a better understanding reached with President Kruger, the development of the South African colonial possessions will steadily proceed. The personal responsibility of Mr. Chamberlain for the raid has entirely failed of proof. and he is therefore entitled to have the stigma, which attached to him in the matter, removed from public recollection. At the same time the conclusion is forced upon one that "the truth, the whole truth," of the Jameson raid has yet to be revealed, and the question is what will time do for us in this regard.

The whole world is becoming very cosmopolitan these days, and probably the sporting instinct is as much responsible for this feature as any other tendency of human nature in its best mood. When one reads of the brother of Egypt's ruler being a distinguished spectator of a polo tournament in Paris, which was the first fashionable gathering on any scale since the charity bazaar fire, and realizes that the Diamond Sculls at Henley have been won by an American this year, that the cricketers of Philadelphia are starring in Great Britain, where the East Indian aristocrat Ranjitsinghi is likewise a crack player, it it not difficult to understand how much is done by sport in aid of social progress. And yet these are but a few instances to the point. The turf has long been international battle-ground, and the leading representatives of France and America are getting their share of the honors and dollars in the British Isles this season. In the dog world the rule of the day was brought into notice by the selection of an English lady to judge the Great Danes at the Amsterdam dog show not long ago, and a great hit she made in her work. American horses have now invaded the show rings of England and have achieved no small measure of success. English lawn tennis and golf champions are about to enter the lists in the Eastern States, and so the rivalries and courtesies of sport progress.

The illumination of the war vessels collected together at Spithead on the occasion of the great naval review was a scene of its kind that has never been surpassed. Some 75,000 sixteen candle-power electric lamps were used, the outline of every detail, even to the Admirals' flags, which were portrayed in red and gold by electric flashes, being traced in glowing light. In the midst of it all the United States cruiser Brooklyn was conspicuous for what was a happy inspiration. At her masts flew two large flags—the American and English—upon which were turned her powerful searchlights, thus rendering the illuminated Stars and Stripes and Union Jack visible to the whole fleet, an effect that in many quarters was considered the most striking in the whole display.

European travel among Americans has greatly diminished during the current year, and as a result transatlantic steamship men are considerably disappointed. The cause of the decrease is generally attributed to hard times rather than to anything else. A popular idea concerning Americans abroad is to the effect that they annually leave in the lap of Europe for travel and pleasure no less that $100,000,000. This idea is very much overdrawn. The real figures, carefully and authentically compiled, come very much nearer $25,000,000. And this sum is nearly or quite offset annually by the money brought into the country by provident immigrants.

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

Few brides dare wear such a wedding garment as that in which Miss Gashwiler was married to Mr. S. M. Shortridge. Instead of the sheer white satin with cloudy trimmings of tulle and orange blossoms, in which most maidens invest themselves for the solemn sacrifice, she wore a vest of basket brocade and a hat of tan trimmed with white wings. But, then, it was not a formal church ceremony, but a family affair, and Miss Gashwiler is an exceedingly pretty girl, and her graceful figure was perfectly displayed by the simple lines of the costume. Indeed, she has never appeared to better advantage, and may truly be called the most beautiful bride of the season. As I have said, the wedding was a very quiet one and was celebrated at the home of Mrs. Gashwiler, 2210 Central Avenue, Vicar-General Prendergast officiating. Only the intimate friends of both families were present. Mr. E. H. Sheldon acted as best man, and Miss Charlotte Gashwiler as bridesmaid. The presents were especially handsome. Mrs. Shortridge, the groom's mother, gave a magnificent loving cup of cut glass mounted in silver. Mrs. Charles Shortridge's gift was a silver service. Some very handsome silver came from Mrs. Major Darling. Mrs. Thomas Ryer sent a gold lorgnette mounted in diamonds and rubies. Colonel Trumbo a magnificent amethyst ring surrounded by diamonds. Mrs. Gashwiler gave her daughter a beautiful diamond crescent. The happy pair went south for their honeymoon, and returning are to live at the Palace Hotel.

CYCLERS ON THE BEACH AT SAN MATEO

The town is very quiet. Although most of the wanderers have returned from the country no thing is occurring. It is noted that the summer has not been a success from the hymenal point of view. There are no engagements to record, no mariages to predict, no affairs are in process, no budding attachments appear to bloom; in fact, matrimonially, the situation is very gloomy. Why this should be is hard to say. Is it because of the financial depression? Prosperity, I am told, is the strongest ally of Hymen. When there is coin there is mating. However, the future is said to be full of promise, so let us hope for the best.

Among the events of a very quiet week was the reception which Mrs. J. H. Jewett gave for the Rounsevelle Wildmans, who soon leave for Hongkong. Mr. Wildman is to be congratulated on his escape from the toils of journalism, for however harassing the care of politics and diplomacy, they are gentle and unexacting in comparison with the labor of publishing a monthly magazine in a community so over-run with periodicals as San Francisco.

The reapearance of John Drew was, indeed, a boon and a blessing to society. The Baldwin has been a species of oasis this week for the old people and young people who have come back from the country and find nothing whatever to do in town. "Rosemary" has attracted large audiences, and on the first night there were theater parties from Burlingame and San Mateo, from San Rafael and from Menlo. But then Mr. Drew is very popular, personally as well as professionally, and he always has friendly faces in his audiences. There were scores of people whom everyone thought at Santa Cruz or Del Monte there, and all the club sets were out. The theater was followed, of course, by supper parties at the Palace Grill and University Club.

The event of the San Rafael season will be the paper chase Saturday. Two handsome silver cups, presented by the Pacific Coast Jockey Club, are to reward the hares who first get in between the pot, and as the trophies are worth something like $50 apiece, their possession is well worth striving for. You know cups make capital vases, and, besides, look fine on oaken sideboards. I am told there will be nearly fifty riders of both sexes—owing to the delegation coming up from Burlingame for the occasion. Las Saturday the paper chase was particularly exciting, and the cups went to Dr. Howitt, who was mounted on one of Frank Johnson's horses, and Miss Morrow. Much regret was expresed that Miss Mary Belle Gwin, who is one of the most graceful and daring horsewomen at the meets, should have missed the scent and taken a wrong course. Though she was first home, having "cut paper," she was debarred from the prize.

Quite a number of people are still at the Hotel Rafael and seem to be enjoying the latter days of the summer season, though the weather this week has been hardly as agreeable as one has a right to expect of Marin County at this time of year. There has been no diminution of parties to Fairfax Villa, which is the standing joy and consolation of all good San Rafaelites. Several large gatherings have occurred there this week. Mrs. Green was hostess of one, Mrs. and Miss Crooks of a second. Mr. and Mrs. Babcock gave a dinner at their beautiful home Tuesday night. There have also been several excursions to the Hoffman-Crosby camp at Liberty's.

It is quite on the cards that the English tennis players who are now crossing raquets with our champions at Newport, may come to the Coast and participate in the invitation tournament which will be given at Del Monte early in September. It will be exciting to see what our men can do against the high lights of the mother country, though it is improbable that even the skill of Champion Whitney will be equal to the Englishmen, who so successfully coped with Wrenn and the other champions at Newport. If the affair can be successfully arranged it would be the source of a great deal of excitement at Monterey, and revive the interest in tennis. The present idea is to arrange a tournament in which the best men of the coast will be invited to participate. There is no reason why the idea cannot be executed, provided the Englishmen will come West. It might not be a bad idea, in this event, to persuade Larned and the Wrenns out here also.

TheEbell Society has been very active during the week in Oakland entertaining a number of Eastern people at luncheon. An Ebell luncheon is always a thing of much delight, but this week it would seem as if the ladies were unusually charming and hospitable. The rooms were decorated with pink azaleas and roses, and the hostesses were Miss Babson, Mrs. Franklin Bangs, Mrs. Gray, Mrs. Morris, Miss Mabel Gray and Miss Blix Smith. The guests of honor were Mrs. Bunnell, Hon. and Mrs. Selah Merrill, Mrs. Henry Wetherbee, Mrs. Farnum, Mr. George W. Percy, Mr. J. Weston Russell and Mrs. F. B. Gwin. An entertaining talk on the Holy Land was given at the Wednesday luncheon by Mrs. E. S. Howard. Mr. George Bunnell, who shortly returns to West Point, was the guest of honor at a luncheon specially gotten up for a few of the young people. It may be said it was the liveliest of the week. Mrs. Owens was hostess. Aside from society, the Ebell has been gathering to itself of late much distinction in many directions. It has been steadily keeping on in its course of culture and of art, and is altogether a thing of much credit in Athens. Next week the rooms wil be thrown open for a ceramic exhibition, and the display bids fair to be as sucessful as the recent rose show. Almost all the ladies who have valuable specimens of china are to loan them for the exhibit.

Speaking of luncheons, Miss Maud Edith Pope gave a pink carnation affair to a few Eastern friends Tuesday at the Hayward Club House. Miss Pope was assisted by her mother, sister and Miss Haywards.

August weddings promise to be many and interesting. Very likely the largest home affair will be that of Miss Mary Nicholson to come off on the 7th. Miss Nicholson is to marry Paul R. Shipley, and over one hundred friends have been summoned to the service, which is to be performed by Rev. Floyd Mynard of St. John's. Last Monday Miss Mary Blom and Mr. Leo R. Weil were married at high noon by the Rev. Mr. Mynard. The wedding was very quiet, through the recent death of Miss Blow, cards being limited to very close friends. Miss Jessie Glasscock, who is soon to be a bride herself, was bridesmaid, and her fiance, Mr. Alex. Baldwin, best man. Mr. and Mrs. Weil are in the south; on their return they will live in Oakland, at 535 Caledonia avenue. Another quiet wedding was that of Miss Nellie A. Wyckhoff, of Berkeley, who married, also on Monday, Mr. James H. Armistead.

Mrs. Henry Wetherbee has a large house party at her Fruitvale home. The number includes Mrs. F. W. Henshaw of Chicago, also Mr. and Mrs. Bailey. Mrs. Wetherbee possesses the seven qualities desirable in a hostess, and enjoys the company of her guests about as much as they do her hospitality. On Saturday a trip was made to the top of Mount Tamalpais. Miss Sara Whitney, who is about to leave for Paris for a couple of years of art study, was surprised Saturday evening by the members of the Lambda Theta Phi fraternity of the Oakland High School. The party was in the nature of a farewell. Miss Nellie Gray was at home Thursday evening and entertained a few friends. Music and games were the features of the evening. Miss Kitchner's heart party Thursday was a rather lively affair, about twenty were present. Dancing followed the cards.

Thursday seems to have had more than its share of pleasure. Dr. Edward's yachting party was another event of the day. Miss Stevens, Miss Bennett, Miss Farrell, Miss Stewart and Miss Miller were aboard, also Dr. Boyes, Charles Miller, R. S. Kitchner and Mr. Farrell.

Mrs. Harry Hinckley of Fruitvale is visiting Mrs. Remi Chabot at her St. Helena ranch. Mr. and Mrs. H. M. A. Miller are at Congress Springs. Mrs Louise Simmons is in Los Gatos, where she will remain about a month. Mrs. Charles Havens, with Miss Prather, Miss E. Wall and Miss Sessions, have returned from Caliente. The Misses Hyde, with several young friends, have taken a house near Bolinas, and are having a very enjoyable outing.

DRAMATIC NOTES

There is but one more week of John Drew in "Rosemary" at the Baldwin. Mr. Drew has been received with greater favor this time than on any previous engagement. The "Heart of Maryland" opens on the 16th.

"The Charity Ball" has the boards at the Columbia next week. Blanche Bates and Frank Worthing will be seen in their old parts. Haddon Chamber's pretty play, "The Idler," is announcel for the week of August 16th.

The grand opera season at the Tivoli commences Monday evening with a production of "Aida," with Mme. Koert-Kronold as Aida, Katherine Fleming-Heinrichs as Amneris, Michelena as Rhadames, and Abramoff as Amonasro. The chorus has been strengthened, also the orchestra; special stage effects have been prepared, and altogether the performance ought to be thoroughly satisfying.

Gus Thomas, the well-known German comedian, makes his appearance at the Orpheum Monday evening, also Hilda Thomas, a comedienne of some reputation. Miss Thomas will be assisted by Frank Barry, a clever pianist. Professor Leonidas with his trained cats and doge has been wonderfully successful, and will continue in the performance. Miss Mary Arniotes remains, also Papinta, the three Rackett Brot..ers, Crawofrd and Manning, Frencelli and Lewis and the Deonizos.

The bill at the Orpheum this week is fairly attractive, many of last week's artists still hold the boards with undiminished popularity, while the newcomers do some very clever "turns" and "acts.' Professor Leonidas' troupe of performing dogs and cats is as good as anything of its kind seen here in some time, while the barrel-jumping Deonzos appear to good advantage in their original and difficult work. Ida Gray Scott has a voice that is worth the applause it receives. Papinta is dancing through the last week, and is quite the feature of the programme. Sousa's new march, played in the intermission, is catching on with the gallery, and soon we may expect to hear a whistling accompaniment from that quarter.

After a sucessful season in San Francisco, the brilliant dramatic singer, Mrs. Ida Grey Scott, has gone East, having enlarged her reputation and the circle of her friends. Mrs. Scott is well-known in New York, and held for a long time the enviable position of leading soprano in Grace Church in that city. She studied under Mmes. Leonard and Damerick in Paris, and also under the great Randeger of London. Mrs. Scott's forte is opera and oratorio, for which genre her voice is admirably adapted. It is a full, rich soprano, handled with all the technical ability only known to the trained and experienced artist. Agatha, in "Der Freischutz," is one of her great roles, while those who have heard her selections from "Aida" pronounce her quite the equal of many an overadvertised "artiste" with managers and European reputations.

On Monday evening Francis Powers' new play, "Turk Meets Greek," will be presented at the Alcazar. The success of "The First Born" has brought Mr. Powers much attention, and from all accounts "Turk Meets Greek" will very likely bring him additional notice. As in the Chinese play, a feature of the new piece will be the music, characteristic of the subject—one number in particular, the hymn to Apollo, supposed to have been written in the first century. The scenery is to be specially elaborate, one view representing the Acropolis by moonlight, and another the city of Athens by moonlight. There are thirty-one speaking parts in the play and a chorus of twenty-five voices. More than sixty people will be on the stage at one time.

The feature of "The Tornado," the play at Morosco's next week, is to be a truly startling imitation of a cyclone of the genuine Kansas kind that one reads about. The tornado is to be the theme of the play; it comes up not only once, but several times during the action, and it may be supposed that the villain finally perishes in it. But whether he does or not it will be strong enough to demolish a score of villains a score of times.

A Clever Characterization by John Drew in "Rosemary."

I am not inclined to quarrel with the critics who accord to "Rosemary" sweetness of sentiment, delicacy of touch, and all the graceful dramatic outlines and charmingly developed details that properly belong to it. But I must confess to a little bit of disappointment. If the management finds the box-office receipts justify a second week of "Rosemary," then must I confess my judgment in the matter unsound, and my estimate of the local theatre-goer sadly out of gear.

Drew is a decided favorite here, has been for a great many years. His style, the creases in his trousers, the accurate curl of his moustache, the parting of his hair, the minutest detail of his personal appearance and stage make-up, are as familiar to San Francisco theatre-goers as they have been to the New Yorker. But for one, I must confess there has been a stereotyped quality to all of these things in the past. In "Rosemary" he breaks away from the drama of society, discards the carefully groomed moustache, takes on a strange wig, and assumes the manners and the customs of an English gentleman of half-a-century ago. Lines fall to him which he most admirably interprets, that require a certain exquisite skill in handling, that must not, to be effective, betray the art encircling their delivery. In three scenes he is a bachelor of forty, and in the fourth a bachelor of ninety. I imagine the regular theatre-goer was curious to ascertain how Mr. Drew would comport himself in such an altogether strange and unusual role, and it is to this curiosity, I think, one may fairly attribute much of "Rosemary's" drawing power.

The plot of the play is simple, and may be briefly stated in this wise. An eloping couple, Dorothy Cruikshank (Isabel Irving) and William Westwood (A. W. Byron) experience a mishap at the gateway of Sir Jasper Thorndyke's park. Sir Jasper (Mr. Drew), returning from the neighboring village, discovers the pair of lovers sitting beside their broken-down chaise, billing and cooing beneath an umbrella in a damp and mournful manner. Acquainting himself with their dilemma, he invites them to partake of his hospitality overnight. The eloping maiden's father (admirably done by Harry Harwood), and the mother (Mrs. Annie Adams), who follow hard after the lovers, are also compelled to seek shelter and accept of Sir Jasper's hospitality. This all takes place at night. Upon the morrow the host, on the first fair view of his dainty guest, falls desperately in love with the eloping Dolly. He diplomatically patches up matters between the parents and the lovers, and upon his invitation they all start for London in his coach to witness the coronation of the Queen. In the upper room of a Mistress Minifie's coffee-house, which Sir Jasper has rented for the occasion, he approaches dangerously near to declaring his love for Miss Dolly, who, by the way, is a most unobservant and simple-minded lass. Just as he is about to transgress the rules of honor and hospitality, Professor Jogram (Daniel Hawkins) interrupts, and making an excuse for the young lady's retirement from the room, reads to Sir Jasper a severe, but well merited, lesson as to his duty in honor toward the young lady and her lover. In the parting between Miss Cruishank and Sir Jasper at the end of the third act, she divides a bunch of rosemary, half of which she proffers to the suffering man with the words, "That's for remembrance." Consumed with love, and moved by the impulse of the moment, Sir Jasper purchases the house wherein this scene took place and dedicates it as a shrine to his love. Annually for fifty years he revisits this room with his friends, the Cruikshanks. Once a year for half a century he dines and wines in this apartment consecrated to the memory of his great love; for fifty years he carries about in his pocket the sacred sprig of rosemary that her hand had given him. All evidencing a great undying, unseverable devotion. The fourth act discovers Sir Jasper, the last survivor of all our friends of the story, at ninety years of age, upon the fiftieth anniversary of the Queen's coronation. Unless the author had in view the idealization of the man, and the emphasizing of his great love, there would be little reason for tacking on to the play this final scene. But he loses this effect, if he intended to create it.

I submit that it out of human nature for this man, constituted as he was, to have forgotten the name of his love, forgotten whether it was a bunch of dogrose or rosemary he had carried for fifty years, or to have forgotten so completely the leaf from his sweetheart's diary that was uncovered by the falling panel. Drew's make-up and acting in this scene are superb, but the lines certainly fail to leave the impression the author was striving for. Sir Jasper has too much to explain, and has forgotten too much that he should have remembered. Better by far resort to the ancient method of explaining the situation to the audience by means of a convenient servant or two laying the table than by forcing it upon this old man. Better to have permitted the aged Sir Jasper, without the intervention of a noisy clown, to close the scene by quiet, effective pantomime rather than by a multiplicity of words. In that presence he need not have been garoulous, but rather the contrary. I cannot but feel that we would have taken away a sweeter and more lasting impression of his Sir Jasper had the finale been more subdued. I can forgive much of the playwright's shortcomings in this regard, however, for the admirable acting of Mr. Drew in this scene.

"The Case of Rebellious Susan" was an interesting play three years ago; it was quite up to date, quite in harmony with things that were and with conditions that promised to be. It was altogether a proper, modern play, and with Isabel Irving as the belligerent Sue, it stopped little this side of perfection—but that was three years ago. The "Case of Rebellious Susan" at the Columbia this week seems rather flat, because of the play, perhaps, particularly also because of some of the players. Save in the last act, the action drags, and in that the best scene is the passage between Sir Richard Kato and Mrs. Quesnal, which is a flawless bit of work. After all, there are only two characters in the whole play that even hint at the natural—only two, with a possible third of Mr. Harabin—Sir Richard and Mrs. Quesnal. Sir Richard has some very bright things to say and some very bright things to do—and to a smaller extent so has Mrs. Quesnal.

Mr. Frank Worthing gets through with Sir Richard very nicely; with his advantage of lines and position he might do better. He is not quite as obtrusively respectable as was Mr. Kelcey, nor even as amiably apologetic, but respectable and amiable enough to be agreeably acceptable. After, or rather before, Sir Richard, should come Lady Susan; at least she should in Mr. Jones' order of precedence; but as the Frawleys play the piece, Eleanor Moretti deserves second consideration. She has a genius for gowning herself and many clever lines of hers and many a smile as well is lost in the hang of a sleeve or the tilt of a hat. As far as Blanche Bates and Lady Susan Harabin agree, there is little to be said—they don't agree at all. Miss Bates is altogether too amiably indifferent to raise a fuss and run away, at least upon the stage. She doesn't seem to grasp the stubborn, willful ideas of the character, nor is she in the least or as sadly tragical as Mr. Jones meant her to be. Another dramatic misfit is Gladys Wallis as Elaine, the lady of the advanced idea. But there is a difference between the two—Miss Bates may reasonably expect to be taken seriously, but as for pretty Miss Wallis—it is such ridiculously apparent acting that it is quite amusing—as much so to the audience as it seems to be to Miss Wallis.

IDA GRAY SCOTT

At the Alcazar the change of programme has somewhat thinned the attendance. In Glen Macdonough's bright comedy sketch, "House or Home," Francis Carlyle and Selene Johnson are seen to advantage. Following this little piece, the farcical comedy, "Betsy," an old friend, under a new name well known to theater-goers in London, comes on the boards. The plot chiefly exploits the doings of a fond mother's white-haired boy, and his double-faced tut... "stands in" with the young fellow in h... capades, and at the same time accepts largesse as a "friend of the family" from his parents. Mrs. Bates as the indulgent mother, confiding in her son's gentle innocence, well fits her role, while the part of the irresponsible father, whose mind is absorbed in politics, is carefully studied and rendered by Frank Bacon. As the tutor, Wallace Shaw is decidedly good. Betsy, the maid, is represented by Miss Bengle Harrison, who overacts and missed her opportunity throughout in a part which should come easy when understood. But it is always hard for the American mind to adapt itself to the manner, speech and action of the British domestic. George Trader as the son is not an entire success, though every now and then his comic efforts are praiseworthy. Miss Selene Johnson, as Madame Polenta, the music teacher, performs her part very creditably, but is given as usual to over-much tossing of her pretty head and other little affectations of manner and speech that run through and mar all her acting. The style in which she is turned out in this piece is a joy, and her figure and carriage are worthy of all admiration. Adele Belgardi's performance in her subordinate part is disappointing.

As a whole, the execution of the little farce is too stagy, and horse-play predominates, while the liberties taken with the original text do not add to the general effect. The style in which the piece is put on the stage is commendable, and though much of the comic effect depends on the threadbare device of rooms with exits too many to follow, there is plenty of amusement in the situations throughout.

"A Bowery Girl" has all the characters of traditional melodrama, the lost heiress, the unscrupulons lawyer, the Italian padrone, the poor but honest young clerk, and all the rest of them, but nevertheless they manage to say brighter things and get through with more interesting action than the average lost heiress or the average poor but honest young man. To this may be attributed the success "A Bowery Girl" has had. Another feature of the play, and one taken to excellent advantage at Morosco's, is the opportunity for attractive scenery. One scene is pretty in particular—the Palisades on the Hudson, and another equally effective represents the housetops of New York with the Brooklyn Bridge in the background. Maud Edna Hall plays Nora Hallihan, the Bowery girl, with much vivacity. Dutton Wanson, the new comedian, as Patrick Hallihan, a ward politician, finds favor through the medium of a stump speech and a couple of new songs. Another amusing character is Mr. George E. Behan's Augustus Hopbaeur. The villainy is supplied by Landeo Stevens as the unscrupulous lawyer, and Fred J. Butler and Lorena Atwood as Cesca and Alicia Bertolina—all three parts are very well played.

"THE GADFLY"

An Interesting Novel Made Notable by a Powerful Scene.

There is a tremendous scene in "The Gadfly" which distinguishes it among the rank and file of current fiction—a scene of such singular intensity and dramatic force that it lives in the memory like a conflagration. It is true that one situation does not make a play nor a single chapter a good novel, but a vital phase often redeems both from the commonplace. When the unfortunate prisoner, lying under sentence of death, finally tells the cardinal in whose hands is his fate that he, the Gadfly, is really his son—the illegitimate son of Cardinal Montanelli—a climax of vital interest is achieved. The complication has been led up to naturally—without obvious straining after effect. The characters, and indeed the events, are all subordinated to the exposition of the hero's temperament; but this is the author's scheme. The two are brought together—the terrible caricaturist and lampooner, who has made the Cardinal the target of his fiercest shafts, and this prince of the church, noted for the purity of his character, the scanctity of his life and the breadth and splendor of his oratory. To make the dialogue between such men worthy of the situation and yet avoid melodrama, is a task to set a genius. How nearly it is achieved by the author, E. L. Voynich, the reader may decide for himself, as an abridgement of the passage is submitted further on.

Otherwise the story is written in a style in which passion is artistically blended with restraint. It is really the story of a temperament—that of "The Gadfly"—for even the characters of Gemma and Montanelli are but foils for the unfolding of his revenge. There is nothing forced about the transformation of the charming boy, Arthur, with his revolutionary inspirations and poetic charm of manner, into the supercilious and affected young man so singularly foppish in attire and yet so earnest and fierce in his advocacy of the cause of Italian freedom. Briefly, the plot is this: Arthur Burton, reputed the son of a wealthy English shipowner of Leghorn, by a second wife, an Italian and a Catholic, is drawn into the great contest for Italian freedom, and, with a number of his college friends and his sweetheart, Gemma, conspires against the Austrian rule. To his spiritual director, the head of the seminary at Pisa, he confides, in confession, the identity of the leader of the conspiracy, and the result is that he and many of his colleagues, together with Bolla, the young leader, of whose attentions to Gemma Arthur is jealous, are arrested. Examined, he declines to give any information, but his associates are convicted on a fictitious confession which his captors alleged he had signed. He is set free and then learns with horror the identity of the priestly informant, and is so horrified at the consequences of his confession that he lets Gemma believe he is guilty of perjury. She strikes him and he flies home, where the families of his step-brothers reside. His aunt, enraged at his arrest and the consequent disgrace, then in a burst of anger, tells him that he is illegitimate, that his father is none other than Montanelli, the priest whom he had learned to love with the deepest and tenderest devotion. The shock of this terrible revelation kills his faith in God and man. He breaks with a hammer the crucifix which had been his mother's, and leaving a note for Montanelli, takes ship for South America, leaving it to be assumed that he has drowned himself. The letter to the man he has learned to know as father is this:

> "I believed in you as I believed in God. God is a thing made of clay, that I can smash with a hammer; and you have fooled me with a lie."

There is a lapse of thirteen years, and then we are introduced to the Mazzinian conspiracy in its riper stages, with Gemma one of its leaders. There is needed in Florence some one to stir up the people against the Jesuits and the government, and Felice Rivarez, known as a writer of sardonic and critical articles, is sent for by the band of discontented spirits to help them. This Rivarez has already figured in revolutionary outbreaks, and for his wit and scathing tongue is known as the "Gadfly." He joins the cause, and fiercely assails the Pope and his party, and especially Cardinal Montanelli, who has grown into the greatest priest in Italy. The characteristics of this strange, impulsive, brilliant man are admirably rendered. Of course the reader guesses he is Arthur, but his colleagues and Gemma do not suspect his identity. He has several encounters with his father, insults him cruelly; learns that his supposed death is the sorrow in the lives of both Gemma and Montanelli. Finally there is an attempt to supply arms to the mountaineers in the Romagna, and the "Gadfly," who is possessed of splendid audacity and strategic ability, is compelled to assume the leadership. After a fight he is captured, and would be executed at once but for the interposition of Cardinal Montanelli, who interferes for humane reasons. He calls on Rivarez, who, knowing his grief, insults him. Appealed to again by the Austrian Governor to withdraw his objection to the shooting of the prisoner, once more he comes to the cell of his enemy. Here occurs the noted scene. In the preceding passages the Cardinal learns that the strange and fascinating "Gadfly" who exercises such an influence over him is really the lost Arthur, whose death he had so bitterly mourned.

When he raised his head the sun had set, and the red glow was dying in the west. They had forgotten time and place, and life and death; they had forgotten, even, that they were enemies.

"Arthur," Montanelli whispered, "are you real? Have you come back to me from the dead?"

"From the dead—" the Gadfly repeated, shivering. He was lying with his head on Montanelli's arm, as a sick child might lie in its mother's embrace.

"You have come back—you have come back at last!"

The Gadfly sighed heavily. "Yes," he said; "and you have to fight me, or to kill me."

"Oh, hush, carino! What is all that now? We have been like two children lost in the dark, mistaking one another for phantoms. Now we have found each other, and have come out into the light. My poor boy, how changed you are—how changed you are! You look as if all the ocean of the world's misery had passed over your head—you that used to be so full of the joy of life! Arthur, is it really you? I have dreamed so often that you had come back to me; and then have waked and seen the outer darkness staring in upon an empty place. How can I know I shall not wake again and find it all a dream? Give me something tangible—tell me how it all happened."

"It happened simply enough. I hid on a goods vessel, as a stowaway, and got out to South America."

"And there?"

"There I—lived, if you like to call it so, till—oh, I have seen something else besides theological seminaries since you used to teach me philosophy! You say you have dreamed of me—yes, and much! You say you have dreamed of me—yes, and I of you—"

He broke off, shuddering.

"Once," he began again abruptly, "I was working in a mine in Ecuador—"

"Not as a miner?"

"No, as a miner's fag—odd-jobbing with the coolies. We had a barrack to sleep in at the pit's mouth; and one night—I had been ill, the same as lately, and carrying stones in the blazing sun—I must have got lightheaded, for I saw you come in at the doorway. You were holding a crucifix like that one on the wall. You were praying, and brushed past me without turning. I cried out to you to help me—to give me poison or a knife—something to put an end to it all before I went mad. And you—ah—!"

He drew one hand across his eyes. Montanelli was still clasping the other.

"I saw in your face that you had heard, but you never looked round; you went on with your prayers. When you had finished, and kissed the crucifix, you glanced round and whispered: 'I am very sorry for you Arthur; but I daren't show it; He would be angry.' And I looked at Him, and the wooden image was laughing.

"Then, when I came to my senses, and saw the barrack and the coolies with their leprosy, I understood. I saw that you care more to curry favor with that devilish God of yours than to save me from any hell. And I have remembered that. I forgot just now when you touched me; I—have been ill, and I used to love you once. But there can be nothing between us but war, and war, and war. What do you want to hold my hand for? Can't you see that while you believe in your Jesus we can't be anything but enemies?"

Montanelli bent his head and kissed the mutilated hand.

"Arthur, how can I help believing in Him? If I have kept my faith through all these frightful years, how can I ever doubt Him any more, now that He has given you back to me? Remember, I thought I had killed you."

"You have that still to do.'

"Arthur!" It was a cry of actual terror; but the Gadfly went on, unheeding:

"Let us be honest, whatever we do, and not shily-shally. You and I stand on two sides of a pit, and it's hopeless trying to join hands across it. If you have decided that you can't, or won't, give up that thing—"he glanced again at the crucifix on the wall—"you must consent to what the Colonel—"

"Consent! My God—consent—Arthur, but I love you!"

The Gadfly's face contracted fearfully.

"Which do you love best, me or that thing?"

Montanelli slowly rose. The very soul in him withered with dread, and he seemed to shrivel up bodily, and to grow feeble, and old, and wilted, like a leaf that the frost has touched. He had awakened out of his dream, and the outer darkness was staring in upon an empty place.

"Arthur, have just a little mercy on me—"

"How much had you for me when your lies drove me out to be slave to the blacks on the sugar plantations? You shudder at that—ah, these tender-hearted saints! This is the man after God's own heart—the man that repents of his sin and lives. No one dies but his son. You say you love me—your love has cost me dear enough! Do you think I can blot out everything, and turn back into Arthur at a few soft words—I, that have been dish-washer in filthy half-caste brothels and stable-boy to Creole farmers that were worse brutes than their own cattle? I, that have been zany in cap and bells for a stroling variety show—drudge and Jack-of-all-trades to the matadors in the bull-fighting ring; I, that have been slave to every black beast who cared to set his foot on my neck; I, that have been starved and spat upon and trampled under foot; I, that have begged for mouldy scraps and been refused because the dogs had the first right? Oh, what is the use of all this! How can I tell you what you have brought on me? And now—you love me! How much do you love me? Enough to give up your God for me? Oh, what has He done for you, this everlasting Jesus—what has He suffered for you, that you should love Him more than me? Is it for the pierced hands He is so dear to you? Look at mine! Look here, and here, and here—"

He tore open his shirt and showed the ghastly scars.

'Padre, this God of yours is an impostor. His wounds are sham wounds, His pain is all a farce! It is I that have the right to your heart! Padre, there is no torture you have not put me to; if you could only know what my life has been! And yet I would not die! I have endured it all, and have possessed my soul in patience, because I would come back and fight this God of yours. I have held this purpose as a shield against my heart, and it has saved me from madness, and from the second death. And now, when I come back, I find Him still in my place—this sham victim that was crucified for six hours, forsooth, and rose again from the dead! Padre, I have been crucified for five years, and I, too, have risen from the dead. What are you going to do with me? What are you going to do with me?"

* * * *

"As you will,' Montanelli said. "Perhaps in your place I should be as merciless as you—God knows. I can't do what you ask, Arthur; but I will do what I can. I will arrange your escape, and when you are safe I will have an accident in the mountains, or take the wrong sleeping draught by mistake—whatever you like to choose. Will that content you? It is all I can do. It is a great sin; but I think He will forgive me. He is more merciful—"

The Gadfly flung out both hands with a sharp cry.

"Oh, that is too much! That is too much! What have I done that you should think of me that way? What right have you— As if I wanted to be revenged on you! Can't you see that I only want to save you? Will you never understand that I love you?"

He caught hold of Montanelli's hands and covered them with burning kisses and tears.

"Padre, come away with us! What have you to do with this dead world of priests and idols? They are full of the dust of bygone ages; they are rotten; they are pestilent and foul! Come out of this plague-stricken Church—come away with us into the light! Padre, it is we that are life and youth; it is we that are the everlasting springtime; it is we that are the future! Padre, the dawn is close upon us—will you miss your part in the sunrise? Wake up, and let us forget the horrible nightmares—wake up, and we will begin our life again! Padre, I have always loved you—always, even when you killed me—will you kill me again?"

Montanelli tore his hands away. "Oh, God have mercy on me!" he cried out. "You have your mother's eyes!"

* * * *

Montanelli turned to the crucifix. "God! Listen to this—!"

His voice died away into the empty stillness without response. Only the mocking devil awoke again in the Gadfly.

" 'C-c-call louder; perchance he s-s-sleepeth'—"

Montanelli started up as if he had been struck. For a moment he stood looking straight before him;—then he sat down on the edge of the pallet, covered his face with both hands, and burst into tears. A long shudder passed through the Gadfly, and the damp cold broke out on his body. He knew what the tears meant.

He left off sobbing at last, and dried his eyes with his handkerchief, like a child that has been crying. As he stood up the handkerchief slipped from his knee and fell to the floor.

"There is no use in talking any more," he said, "You understand?"

"I understand,' the Gadfly answered, with dull submission. "It's not your fault. Your God is hungry, and must be fed."

Montanelli turned towards him. The grave that was to be dug was not more still than they were. Silent, they looked into each other's eyes, as two lovers, torn apart, might gaze across the barrier they cannot pass.

Power and eloquence are not the only attributes of this new writer. The character of the "Gadfly" throughout is admirably sutsained; the terrible wit is infused with such an accent of personality that it is the true expression of the speaker's mind, literally his own words—a rare achievement. The defect of the book is that the background is not painted with sufficient breadth—the human tragedy hinges on the political situation, and one has only an edge of it indicated. The subordinate characters hardly justify themselves, and the conspirators, except Gemma, are purely lay figures. One cannot but think that "The Gadfly" would dramatize magnificently and would make a priceless role for Richard Mansfield.

"Oh no," the lawyer said, soothingly, "I know you didn't really steal the stove! The only difficulty lies in proving it. But now that I am sure of your innocence, I'll manage it if you hand me ten dollars, and the rest—" "Ten dollars, boss," repeated the accused, "you might as well make it ten thousand! I've got no money." "No money?" the lawyer cried, indignantly. But suddenly brightening, he added, "Well, I like to help honest men in trouble, so if you send me the stove, when I get you out of the scrape we'll call it square!"

MIDSUMMER MAGAZINES

Outdoor Literature for Vacation Consumption.

The August editions of the big magazines are commonly glorified as "Holiday" or "Fiction Numbers," and are presumably prepared for idle citizens and citizenesses who are summering at the seaside or among the hills. For instance, the "Century" calls its production a "Midsummer Holiday Number, and apparently it is intended for those who would go abroad if they could. "Harper's" is richly provided with fiction. "The Cosmopolitan" has a fair issue, but makes no concession to the season, whereas the "Atlantic" presents a first-rate menu, in which the serious and the entertaining are artistically blended.

The leading feature of this magazine is the publication of certain letters of Dean Swift, which have never before been in print. Though interesting they are notable because of their author rather than for intrinsic charm. It is evident, indeed, that the Dean had a high temper and was much perturbed by the minor worries of the world, showing that petty troubles harass the great as well as the insignificant. It is interesting to learn that there are few rich men in Kansas. In the course of an intelligent and very readable article, William Allen White, who became famous on the strength of an editorial entitled "What's the Matter With Kansas?" states that men who own a million dollars worth of property number less than half a score in the whole State. However, the town banker is the big man in every community, just as he is elsewhere. Alvin F. Sanborn, who wrote the striking little book called "Moody's Lodging House," and who has been contributing a series of studies of New England life in the "Atlantic," writes of "A Massachusetts Shoe Town," and describes the evolution of an agricultural community into a manufacturing city. Both these articles are of actual value, and are clever appraisements of real American conditions. Students of our social life can find nothing better or truer. John Muir is a feature of the "Century" as well as of the "Atlantic," and his paper on "The Alaska Trip" is especially interesting in view of the Klondyke excitement. We are told the pictures with which it is illustrated are based on drawings by the author. It seems a decided pity that photographs by Taber or other competent artists who have made the Alaskan trip were not used in place of these stiff, ungraceful engravings, which really mar rather than assist the text. It must be admitted that Muir's prose requires little of illustration, however. His style is singularly vivid and abounds in striking and brilliant descriptive pasages. Even Lafcadio Hearn could hardly do better than this passage on "American Forests," in the "Atlantic":

"The forests of America, however slighted by man, must have been a great delight to God; for they were the best He ever planted. The whole continent was a garden, and it seemed to be favored from the beginning above all the other wild parks and gardens of the globe. To prepare the ground, it was rolled and sifted in seas with infinite loving deliberation and forethought, lifted into light, submerged and warmed over and over again, pressed and crumpled into folds and ridges, mountains and hills, subsoiled with heaving volcanic fires, ploughed and ground and sculptured into scenery and soil with glaciers and rivers—every feature growing and changing from beauty to beauty, higher and higher. And in the fullness of time it was planted in groves, and belts, and the largest, most varied, most fruitful, and most broad, exuberant, mantling forests, with beautiful trees in the world. Bright seas made its border with wavy embroidery and icebergs; magnificent deserts were outspread in the middle of it, mossy tundras on the north, savannas on the south, and blooming prairies and plains; while lakes and rivers shone through all the vast forests and openings alike, and happy birds and beasts gave delightful animation. Everywhere, everywhere over all the blessed continent, there was beauty and melody, and kindly, wholesome, foodful abundance."

Mrs. Skidmore's article on "Java," in the "Century," affords insight into life and things in the Dutch colonies that is very entertaining. There is much other foreign travel in England and Norway, all good of its kind, and one particularly neat story, "Concealed Weapons," a clever idea briefly and dextrously handled by Margaret Sutton Briscoe, who has a light touch and a skillful hand.

Apropos of stories, one of the best in the curent magazines, always excepting Kipling's magnificent tale in "Scribner's" is "Sharon's Choice," by Owen Wister, in "Harper's." This is a rattling good yarn, admirably worked up, blending sentiment and fun with real skill. It is worth a dozen "Gallaghers" or "Van Bibbers." By the way, Mr. Davis is fully represented by an account of the McKinley inauguration. Rather late, it would seem. De Thulstrup's pictures are certainly not an assistance to the prose. However, Mr. Davis always swings along in a gay and easy way, and, in fact, next to G. W. Stevens, of the London "Mail," is perhaps the best newspaper correspondent in the world. He rarely fails to make an entertaining article, and his comment and criticisms, though it be so long after the event, are much to the point.

"The Kentuckians,' as it unrolls, sustains the promise of its first chapters and is certainly going to be an excellent story. Hopkinson Smith's article on Hungary, Poultney Bigelow's African story, and the "Progress in Physics" are all good of their kind, especially Smith's. The best pictures in the number are undoubtedly the magnificent illustrations by Remington of his story, "The Sergeant of the Orphan Troop." It is difficult to say which of this series is the cleverest, for they are all brilliant compositions. Poultney Bigelow's explanation of the failure of Germany's colonization schemes in Africa is that its colonies are overridden by meddlesome officials. William the Witless has a million square miles of territory in the Dark Continent and an immense force of clerks and superintendents to interfere with the settlers. German colonies, he declares, cannot prosper until they are managed by men who know their business. The Boers, who have always complained of English tyranny, tried to establish themselves in certain portions of the African dominion of their Teutonic ally, but had to return to the Transvaal, discouraged and with no words to describe the administration of their friends. "The Parisian," it seems, has been consolidated with "Romance," and appeals to the clientelle of the latter as well as to its own especial readers. There are always some good stories and interesting articles in this magazine, but the half-tones with which it is illustrated are distinguished by their peculiar atrocity. It is impossible to make a good engraving from a newspaper print, though the editor of "The Parisian" does not seem to have discovered the fact.

Really it is a catalogue of horrors that Julian Hawthorne gives us in "India Starving." The theme is worthy of his remarkable descriptive skill. A second good article in this "Cosmopolitan" is "The Study of the Japanses Drama," which makes excellent material and has the value of variety. One is forced to admit that the new rendering of the Rubaiyat by Le Gallienne is a disappointment. Had it been offered without the chorus of advance laudation, it might have been judged on its merits, but the foolish exaltation of this poetry for advertising purposes defeated its own end, just as one is prejudiced in advance against an actress who is described as the most beautiful woman in the world.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever. Nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give one hundred dollars for any case of deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

GOSSIP OF EUROPE

The Latest On Dits from Continental Capitals.

Poor Earl Russell is in a bad way. The House of Lords, swathed and bandaged in red tape as any Egyptian mummy with bandages (and about as much up to date, by the way), has decided by a majority of five judges against four that the Earl cannot be legally divorced from his wife. Lady Russel has about ruined her husband financially and socially, and has heaped all manner of the most scurrilous abuse and calumnies upon him, and defamed and traduced him beyond all precedent.

However, she cannot be convicted of cruelty in the eyes of the law—the English law—so her marriage must stand. Had the lady so much as menaced her husband with a penknife the Earl might have been free of her. But legal jargon is evidently more precious in the eyes of England's law that the good name of England's peerage. Just to make the Earl quite happy his wife's mother has been, within a few days, liberated from the Halloway Jail, where she has been "doing time" for criminal libel. What interesting times to come in this menage Russell!

Another matter which is causing no end of comment here is the possible appointment of the Duke of Connaught as Commander-in-Chief, to take the place of Lord Wolseley, whose very bad health must soon place his name upon the retired list. Of course every one anticipated that Lord Roberts, who is really the most popular man and the best soldier in the army, would succeed Wolsley, but it appears now that tne line of succession will be altered to suit the desires of the Queen. The gossip that is rife over the matter is to the effect that so good a soldier as Sir Evelyn Wood is to be passed over and Connaught is to be made Adjutant-General over Sir Evelyn's head. The Duke of Connaught is, of course, the court candidate, and all the influence of that powerful circle is to be brought to bear upon the Secretary of War. Those in a position to know state that the pressure is likely to be irresistible, too.

Her gracious Majesty Victoria has said "Thank you" to her devoted subjects for that little jubilee affair in a letter which has recently appeared in the London dailies. But it is not her Majesty's gratitude, as expressed in this journalistic round-robin that has set her subjects talking; it is her statement (in a postscript, by the way, and so of double importance) that so long as she lives she will reign. There were rumors of all sorts that the jubilee was to be the Queen's last public function—the grand transformation scene in which she made her exit from the stage of public life, and there were plenty of people to be found who predicted that the next, not distant, jubilation would be on the occasion of the crowning of the Prince of Wales. But for the matter of that all readers are by this time familiar with that dear, old newspaper story, the reporters pet and standby, wherein it was related that Victoria was on the point of giving up crown and scepter in favor of her oldest son. However that story is shelved now once and for all. Victoria's words were unmistakable. She has lived a Queen nearly all her life, and as Queen she means to die.

The news comes up here from Henley that at last the inevitable has happened. (This en passant, is a way the inevitable has). The exorbitant prices in which the Henley hotelkeepers and hack-driver indulge themelves on the ocasion of the regattas, has worked a reaction, and the affair this year was as near to an ugly failure as its managers would care to come a second time. Fewer Americans than usual were to be seen along the river, the notable exceptions being the members of the Harvard 'Varsity crew, who have been royally entertained throughout the week by Mr. Lehman.

Another fiasco, and one of the most ludicrous that has come to light of late years, is that which brought to an untimely end the much-advertised naval maneuvers. As usual, a misunderstanding of orders was the cause. The Admiralty had arranged to split the fleet into two supposed hostile squadrons. Admiral Fellows, who was in command of one of the squadrons, was directed to proceed out of Blackford Bay on the Irish coast, await a declaration of war, and then attempt to return before being intercepted by squadron number two. Fellows heard the news of the war when sixty miles out of the bay (the Admiralty supposing he had gone much farther). He at once turned about, re-entered the bay and wired to the head office, "The war is over." His answer was that the war had not yet even begun, and that he was to steam to a point 200 miles up the coast. Fellows obeyed, and once more turned in his tracks at the spot designated. Approaching Blackford Bay the enemy—squadron number two—appeared and opened fire. Fellows at once signalled that he had already taken Ireland, and that as it was Sunday and the men at divine service, he must be excused from entering into action. The Admiralty made a few pointed remarks upon the stupidity which had ruined their well-laid plans, but naval circles are all agog with the affair, and the last of it will not be heard for some time to come.

TURF TOPICS

Futurity Stakes — Breeding Notes — Track Rules — Donkey Lore.

The grand trotting circuit of the State opened at the Oakland track last Saturday and is still in progress. The attendance on the first day was good, but has since fallen off. Further reference to the meeting is deferred to a later issue.

The tenth Futurity, the most valuable event on the American turf, will be run on August 24th at the autumn meeting of the Coney Island Jockey Club. The value of the stakes wil amount to about $45,000. There were 778 original entries, of which 93 are still standing, 15 of the youngsters thus remaining in having been bred in California. Of these Burns & Waterhouse's b. f. Recreation (Morello-Picnic), J. G. Follansbee's b. c. Murillo (Morello-Snowdrop), and Marcus Daly's ch. f. Briar Sweet (imp. Sir Modred-Sweetbriar) are reckoned amongst those that may face the starter. So far as the racing here last spring may serve as a guide, Recreation is entitled to be considered a high-class filly. Little of her present form is known, however, and she has to meet a colt with a great reputation in J. E. Madden's Howland (Hindoo-imp. Ricochet). As the owner of the latter has also in his stable, though not eligible, that smart two-year-old Hamburg, whom Mr. Madden is said to consider inferior to Howland, the Eastern talent are disposed to think he has the race at his mercy. However, between now and the day of the race there may be more light on the present comparative merits of the probable starters.

News has reached this coast that Ruinart, the horse that was expected to prove a champion for California in the East this season, has gone amiss, the report being that he strained himself galloping on a heavy track. Unfortunately this is not the first time he has been affected in such a way that he could not extend himself. We saw the same thing at Ingleside on April 30th last, the last race he ran in, when he failed to raise a gallop. Probably his malady is constitutional and recurrent, and not due to any specific strain or local injury.

Adverting to my note a week ago mentioning the intended reshipment of imp. Islington to his breeder in England, it has since been reported that Michael III, two years, the best of his get that has been seen out so far, recently changed hands in the East at $4,500.

An English-bred son of Musket, Petronel, died at the Cobham Stud early last month at the age of twenty years. As a three-year-old he won the Two Thousand Guineas for his breeder, the Duke of Beaufort, and as a four-year-old met and defeated some of the best horses of the day over long distance courses, thus proving that he had inherited the great staying qualities of his sire. At the stud this son of Musket did nothing to make him as famous as others of that great horse's get, as until he stood at Cobham late in his career little chance was given him in the way of mares.

Sportsmen everywhere regretted to hear of the death of Domino, one of the most distinguished performers ever seen on the turf in this country. He succumbed to an attack of meningitis a few days ago at the Kentucky stud of his owner, Mr. James R. Keene. Domino was by Himyar, out of Mannie Gray, by Enquirer, she the dam of Lady Reel, who produced Hamburg, the best public performer amongst the two-year-olds this season. Foaled in 1891, and sold as a yearling to Mr. Keene by his breeder, Major B. G. Thomas, of Lexington, Ky., Domino proved the winner of eight events, including the Futurity, and ran a dead heat, in 1893, these being all the races he started in that year, when he also made the world's record for six furlongs, carrying 128 pounds—a great performance for a two-year-old. As a racehorse he was pre-eminent in his two-year-old career. It is a sad pity that he should so soon have gone to join the majority with the likewise celebrated Morello, who immediately preceded him in Futurity honors. There are now nine foals to him living and some twenty mares were put to the departed hero this season.

A careful perusal of the full text of the new rules recently adopted by the Turf Congress shows them to be even more far-reaching than at first they were made to appear. Not only is every horse that may be raced on an offending track to be outlawed, but even the get of any stallion or produce of any mare that may have been ruled off. Owners and breeders will, therefore, have to see that their stock is in good standing henceforward, or it will be of no value on the turf, so far as events taking place under Turf Congress rules are concerned until at least the second generation has been reached. In these days of small profits and quick returns this would probably be somewhat too long to wait.

The Turf Congress is now expected to deal with the question of assigning dates to tracks operating under its rules, and limiting the length of meetings thereat.

Altogether there is every appearance of common ground in turf government being taken in most matters of importance by the Jockey Club and the Turf Congress, a condition of affairs that must be of great benefit to the interests of racing in America. The settlement of the foreign book question has given universal satisfaction to owners and breeders, and has, in fact, been approved on all sides.

In the four-footed kingdom it is a long step from Derby winners to donkeys, but Erin can make it. Owing to the prevalence of rinderpest in South Africa, where oxen are used so largely for transport, attention has been turned to the necessity of providing other animals to fill their place, and as the hide of the donkey, unlike that of the horse, is proof against the tsetse fly, the hardy and patient Irish-bred jackass is being bought up in large numbers for export. The type is inferior to that of the animals raised in America, Northern Africa and Eastern Europe, but an improved demand may alter this and lead to more attention being given to breeding. The ass has stood the test of time and has virtues which have made him the trusted slave and companion of monarchs, prelates, and even greater than they, while he is ever the poor man's friend. Donkey love, indeed, is endless, but here let me put a little story, for the first time, on paper, Many years ago I made one at a dinner to a friend about to leave on a visit to a far-off country, and whose only trouble in life was the most grievous infirmity of speech I ever met with. After the toast of the occasion had been duly honored, an over-zealous intimate placed beside him, remained standing and said he felt sure the company would permit him to return thanks on behalf of our friend, which he did entirely to his own satisfaction. When the speaker sat down, however, our guest arose, and with what breath his indignation had spared to him, proceeded, with surprising ease and little or no hesitation, to utter these few words: "Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen: Let me ask you one question: When Balaam couldn't speak, did his ass speak for him?" Poor fellow! He afterwards was killed through a horse bolting with him; so that, if perchance we be not creatures of fate, he had better have stuck to one of the meek and lowly tribe, for which he felt such scorn, but of whose varied assortment of habits running away is not one.

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

A curate, highly respected in his dioceses, was slowly recovering after a serious illness, when there came one morning to his home a laborer who insisted on seeing him. "Well, my man, what can I do for you," asked the convalescent. "I beg your pardon, sir," answered the caller, "but you see, Jim Giles, wot's a neighbor of mine, died last week, and we're going to bury him to-morrer at T— (three miles away), and we wont's yer to come and 'ficiate." "But my good man," answered the curate, "I do not think I am sufficiently strong to undertake the task. Why do you not ask the vicar?" "We was a-goin' to sir, only we decided to arsk yer fust, thinkin' a pleasant drive in the morning coach 'ud do yer good!" The appeal was irresistible, and the curate officiated.

Lord Roberts once gave instructions to a native Indian servant to prepare his bath at a certain horur. In the meantime a fierce attack was made by the enemy. Lord Roberts dashed to the front, forgetting about his bath and his orders. In the midst of the engagement the servant, who had passed safely through the rain of bullets, suddenly appeared among the headquarters staff, and made direct to Lord Roberts. "Sahib," said he, "your bath is ready." Another story of native sagacity comes from Chitral. Early one morning, a subaltern was awakened by a brother subaltern's servant pulling at his feet. "Sahib," whispered the servant, fearful of probable wrath, "Sahib, what am I to do? My master told me to wake him at half past six, and he did not go to bed till seven."

Frederic Locker used to tell a story about Sir Arthur Josselyn, who had Munchausen tenderness, and loved to relate tall yarns about his adventures among the red Indians. He was in the middle of some wild experiences, when he was cleverly stopped by Lord Barrymore. "Did you ever see anything of the Chick-chows?" "Oh! a good deal," said Sir Arthur; a very cruel tribe, the Chick-chows." "And the Cherry-chows?" "Oh, very much among the Cherry-chows," continued Sir Arthur, "the Cherry-chows were singularly kind to my fellows." "And pray, Sir Arthur, did you see much of the Tol-de-roddy-bow-wows?" This was too much even for Sir Arthur, but the company was relieved.

When Narvaez, Duke of Valencia, lay on his deathbed, the Archbishop of Granada stood by his side, endeavoring to prepare him for the great change. "I trust you have pardoned all your enemies, that you also may receive forgiveness." "I have no enemies," said the dying man. "But, your excellency, a man who has been so long in office as you have—" "I haven't one, I tell you." "Still, it is just possible—" "Not one, I repeat." "Pardon me, Your Excellency—" Losing all patience, Narvaez raised himself up with what strength he had left, and said to the Archbishop: "Look here, I have no enemies; I had them all shot, and there's an end to it."

James Payne, in the "Nineteenth Century," tells a story about the funeral of a lady, who had died suddenly. Her husband, a man still young, selfish, and self-indulgent, was gloomy, not because of his bereavement, but because of the trouble it entailed. He would have gone away, had he dared, and left the last rites to her relatives, whom he hated so much that he would not be shut up in a carriage with any of them, but would ride alone. "No," said a friend, "you must not do that. If you will not ride with your relatives you must go with the clergyman." "The clergyman! well, if I must, I must, but it will quite spoil my day."

The late Lord Bowen had a keen wit. On the occasion of the Queen's Jubilee the judges were drawing up an address to the Queen. "Conscious as we are of our shortcomings," ran the address; "conscious as we are of one another's shortcomings," suggested Lord Bowen. When appointed a law lord, an intimate friend congratulated Lord Bowen on his promotion, suggesting he would find the duty easy, seeing he had only to pass on the opinions of other jurists. "That's true," replied Bowen. "All I have to do is to agree, and might well have been raised to the perrage as 'Lord Concurry.'"

A Congressman, upon meeting a country friend in Washington recently, asked the latter what he thought of the place. "Waal," replied the man from the mountains, "'tween yo' an' me, I'm sorter disappointed! I've heard all the big men o' the United States was hyar. I done sarched high an low all day fer 'em, an' I didn't see none. The feller on th' bench—th' jedge I reckon he be—in one o' them two co'trooms up thar, is middlin' hefty, but ole Abe Thompson thet runs the saloon in Bristol 'd make two o' him. There may be big men hyar, but I kaint fin' 'em."

A porter in a railway station, with an eye to business, carried the grip of a somewhat seedy looking lawyer to a car, and finding himself about to be dismissed with a "Thank you," civilly remarked: "Beg pardon, sir, but me and my mate are partners, and if he asks me what you gave, what shall I say?" The lawyer said nothing, but gave him a dime.

Dr. Samuel S. Wesley, being present during a performance of his fine anthem, "Ascribe unto the Lord," the basses sang their recitative, "Noses have they, and smell not," in a vulgar nasal tone, when Wesley remarked, in his most sarcastic manner, "No, they keep their noses to sing through."

SALISBURY'S TRADE POLICY.

Lord Salisbury's Government has served notice on the German and Belgian Governments that the existing treaties of commerce with the United Kingdom will be abrogated in July, 1898. This notice is the formal declaration to the world of the acceptance by Great Britain of the principle of preferences in trade between the mother country and her colonies. The Tariff Act passed at the recent session of the Canadian Parliament offered to any country which admitted to Canadian products free of duty a reduction of twenty-five per cent. from the rates established by the Act on imports into Canada from such country. While the offer was made in general terms, it was perfectly understood that the United Kingdom was the only country in position to profit by it, as it was the only country admitting Canadian products free. But an obstacle existed in the way of the British Government in the treaties with Germany and Belgium, which provided, in effect, that German and Belgian products should not be subject in the British colonies to other or higher duties than British goods. It is this obstacle which has been removed by the denunciation of the treaties, and soon the British manufacturer will be in a position to enjoy the the preference tendered him by the Dominion Parliament.

The step taken by Lord Salisbury marks a serious departure from the policy of uniformity in trade relations which has been pursued by the British Government. Its first effect will be to give to the British manufacturer a decided advantage in the Canadian markets over his competitors in New England and the Eastern States, as well as over his dreaded rival in Germany. Its ultimate effect may be far more important. For, though the Canadians ask nothing, at present, in return for the preference which they have offered to their fellow subjects in the mother country, it is perfectly well known that their design is to secure for themselves, soon or late, a corresponding advantage for their own products in British markets. They can obtain such an advantage only from a British Government which will be willing to depart from the policy of free trade so far as to levy duties on imported food products from which Canadian products would be exempted. Such a step would involve no surrender of the principle of freedom of trade. It would not involve any acceptance of the principle of protection for the encouragement of private interests or industries or for the preservation of a home market. It would be merely an acknowledgment that the unity of the British Empire, politically and commercially, is worth some sacrifice on the part of the British consumers. Whether they will be willing to make the sacrifice when called on to do so remains to be seen. If they shall accept the new policy, it will be a matter of very great concern to the people of the United States. Great Britain is the best customer our farmers have, and our farm products go free into every port of the United Kingdom. If the time comes when our food products must be sent to that market handicapped by a duty from which the products of our Canadian neighbors and of other British colonials are exempt we may have to revive some of our ideas as to the controlling value of the home market.

THE MISTAKEN "CALL."

The "Call" has made a tardy discovery that slavery and involuntary servitude exist in Chinatown in San Francisco and, presumably, in other Chinatowns in California, not as a punishment for crime whereof the unfortunate bondwomen have been duly convicted, but for the purpose of compelling the slaves to commit crime from which the masters derive a revenue. For these offenses neither slaves nor. masters have been prosecuted by the officers of the law, though it is notorious that this species of slavery has existed in the cities of the Pacific Coast ever since the Chinese became an appreciable element of the population. At this late day the indignant "Call" has aroused itself and is devoting its energies to the circulation of a petition praying the President of the United States to take steps for the suppression of this survival of human slavery which has continued to exist in violation of the provisions of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. While we share deeply in the commendable indignation of the "Call," and have no wet blankets to cast on the virtuous efforts of the new anti-slavery crusade, we submit, respectfully, that it is a far cry from Chinatown to the White House. Slavery is just as much an offense to the Constitution and laws of California as to those of the United States, and the offenses which the miserable Mongolian bond-women are compelled to commit, from the revenues of which they and their owners subsist, are punishable under the municipal ordinances of San Francisco. The police power of the State and the city is more than adequate to the suppression of this last relic of "the relic of barbarism," and to the punishment of those who traffic in Mongolian womanhood. That our officers of the law are corrupt or incompetent is good reason for arousing a crusade against them, but a very indifferent reason for calling across the continent for the help of the President. The decision which made slavery impossible in England was rendered after a hearing on the return to a writ of habeas corpus. Why cannot the "Call," before worrying the President, employ a good lawyer, if it has none in its service at present, to sue out a few such writs in behalf of the slave girls, and to institute a few prosecutions against the owners and managers of the slave pens in Chinatown? It is a remarkable trait of our people that their sympathy with the wronged and the suffering varies inversely as the distance by which the victims are removed from us. We send droves of missionaries and barrels of dollars to relieve and enlighten the Chinese in China, while we view with complacency the existence of the same barbarism transplanted to our own city. The remedy for the imported evil is ready at hand whenever we make up our minds to apply it. The "Call" seems to value and rely on a remedy in proportion to its remoteness and lack of availability.

OUR OBSTRUCTED STREETS.

The streets of San Francisco are much better cleaned now than they were a few years ago, but at some seasons of the year the people of San Francisco are no more comfortable for the improvement in cleanliness—in fact, the street cleaning operations, as now conducted, add something to the natural discomfort of summer life in the city. The purpose of street cleaning is not only to remove the dust and other refuse from the pavements, but also to keep it out of the atmosphere. As the streets are nowc leaned, every canvas-clad wielder of a broom is merely an energetic ally of the trade wind in the work of disseminating finely divided street refuse through the atmosphere from which it is liberally deposited in the nostrils and lungs of the wayfaring citizen. And when the sweeper, by tireless industry, has rescued a collection of dust and rubbish from the clutches of the west wind, it is loaded, dry, into an uncovered cart, from which the wind can continue its work of distribution while the cart is on its way to the place of final deposit, wherever that may be. It is perfectly reasonable to conclude that no place of deposit really exists, or is at all necessary; for if the pilgrimage of the carts is only moderately protracted they must certainly arrive empty. If our streets cannot be sprinkled before being swept we must submit that the public comfort will be promoted by leaving the trade winds to do their dusty work, unaided by the brooms and open carts of the street cleaners during the summer season.

Another thing which adds greatly to the discomfort of our streets in summer is the indulgence extended to builders and contractors in the use of streets and sidewalks for building purposes. Whoever chooses to erect a new structure or to repair an old one may not only shut the people out from the use of the public ways, but may use the streets and sidewalks for the accumulation and storage of building materials in large quantities for an indefinite period. The unfortunate pedestrian who approaches such a deposit from the leeward on a summer afternoon has to make his way over cobblestones and car tracks, through a tempest of lime, sand, cement, shavings, plaster and similar materials, which it would seem to be to the interest of the contractor to save, even if the agents of the law are unable or unwilling to compel him to keep them under cover. Many blocks in our city have been obstructed in this fashion for months, and are obstructed now to an extent that would be considered disgraceful and intolerable in a small Eastern town. We are a village people with village ways, in some things, and we endure patiently and without complaint such public nuisances as would arouse the wrath of the citizens of any truly civilized city. To promote the public comfort is, perhaps, the first object of municipal government, and with respect to public comfort we seem to be in a condition of ignorance and apathy from which even the best of new charters cannot redeem us.

ZIONISM—THE LATEST CRAZE.

The remarkable movement of large numbers of the Jewish race for the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine, under the suzerainty of the Sultan, as declared, but with a view, doubtless to the achievement of ultimate political independence, continues to grow and to attract wide-spread attention. The movement originated with Dr. Herzl, an eminent Jew of Vienna, and has received the enthusiastic support of Dr. Max Nordan and many other European Jews of European fame, including the widow of the opulent Baron Hirsch. The believers in the scheme, who have come to be known as Zionists, are going to hold a convention at Basle, in Switzerland, for the purpose of devising ways and means of realizing their dreams of an earthly Zion for their race, and the attendance of delegates promises to be numerous.

A missionary of the movement appeared in this country recently for the purpose of arousing the enthusiasm and enlisting the energies of our Jewish fellow-countrymen in behalf of the Zionist enterprise. It is pleasant to note that he met with a very cool reception, and no appreciable support except among some colonies of Jews in the Eastern cities, Jews who have not yet had time to become Americanized. Not a single Jewish congregation of any importance has given its adhesion to the new movement, and not one of the great Hebrew societies and fraternities has afforded it any support or encouragement. In countries wher the political and social conditions of the Jews compel them to regard themselves as aliens, as men without country, they may easily be aroused to enthusiasm for any scheme which promises them a political fatherland in a theocratic state, modeled, perhaps, on the ancient Israel of the time of the Judges. But American Jews are good citizens and they have never learned to regard themselves as aliens, whether this be the land of their birth or of their adoption only. They have set themselves earnestly to work for the development of the ideas of citizenship in the large bodies of their fellow Jews who have recently come to our country, and they are not liable to be led away by the enthusiastic dreamers of Zionism.

THE PROPOSED TAX LEVY.

The annual shriek of protest against the proposed tax levy for the coming year is now resounding through the city. The Supervisors have, as usual, disregarded their pledge to keep the city's expenses within a certain arbitrary limit and have produced a budget which, for State and city purposes together, calls for a levy of more than two per cent. on assessed values. Hence the loud cries of protest from indignant taxpayers and loud calls to the Mayor to exercise his veto power in order to protect the pockets of the taxpayers from what they propose to regard as a plundering raid of the tax-eaters. There remains some doubt of the Mayor's legal right to veto the tax levy proposed, and if he should attempt to exercise the dubious power the city government may find itself in a deadlock, from which it could be extricated only by a course of litigation, during which the municipal service and the taxpayers' pockets might easily come to greater grief than would be wrought by the proposed levy, admitting it to be as extravagant as the protesting citizens declare it to be.

But the extravagance of the proposed taxation cannot be demonstrated by mere comparison with the levies of previous fiscal years. We have deliberately chosen to remain under a form of city government in which the city's credit is not available for the city's needs. We have chosen Supervisors to conduct our municipal affairs and have deliberately discredited them by refusing to permit them to anticipate the revenues of future years for the purposes for which the present generation of taxpayers should not be exclusively responsible. Under this system the city revenue for each fiscal year must be sufficient to meet the entire expenditure for that year, and the measure by which to determine the justice or the expediency of any proposed levy is the estimate of the city's wants for that year. The expenses of previous years have no bearing on the problem except as they may furnish light as to the probable expense of certain permanent branches of the municipal service. If, for instance, the people desire a park in the Mission, with a menagerie attachment, the only way of securing it is to pay a lump sum in taxes to buy the site and pay for the necessary improvements. If in order to make a showing of economy in preceding years our public school buildings have been suffered to become dilapidated, obsolete and inadequate the expense of bringing them up to the measure of our needs must be met sooner or later, and the tax levy must be accordingly swollen. Of course this system of paying our way is extravagant and absurd, and it is certain to produce wide variations in the rates of taxation for different years; but so long as we adhere to this system it is silly to object to a heavy tax rate as extravagant and due to official corruption simply because it is heavier than some preceding levy.

The only good thing that may be hoped for as an outcome of the present muddle is a new system of government for our city—a system which will put into separate hands the duty of raising the city's revenues and the duty of expending them, thereby removing the temptatation to impose extravagant taxation for the purpose of making extravagant appropriations. And such a system should provide for the utilization of one city's credit in order that the expense of costly improvements may be in some part borne by our successors in the enjoyment of them. Let us have a new charter.

Rather an amusing contretemps occurred recently in Los Angeles between the Bryan banqueting committee and a certain southern politician over the admission of the latter to the Bryant banquet. It seems this gentleman, who is highly discredited in the party, bought and paid for a ticket, got a receipt and announced he proposed to attend. Thereupon a score of highly respectable gentlemen declared they would leave if he appeared. The invitation was therefore canceled, and the politician announces he will sue for breach of privilege. That he has sufficient audacity need not be doubted. Some years ago this gentleman represented a certain southern county in the Senate, and during his career in Sacramento he acquired real prominence as a boodler. It was known he had a hand in every steal that was attempted, and indeed his name was a byword among the tricksters. So notorious was his connection with certain deals that the home papers began to comment on the indecency of his record, and certain of the most influential of his constituents declared that the county should show its reprobation of his course by pelting him on his home coming with dead cats and eggs. Just before the end of the session his wife, who had become quite alarmed at all the rumors, suggested that ere returning home they take a trip, so that the feeling wrought up against her precious spouse would have an opportunity to subside. But he magnificently waived aside her fears, declaring his popularity unabated and assuring her he would have not only the finest reception ever accorded a returning legislator, but would also be presented on the station platform with a cane. There was an astute agent in the town, and to him the Senator wrote explaining the situation and stating that he desired a public reception with a band and the cane, and asked how much it would cost. The agent realized the difficulties of the task, but said it could be accomplished for a few hundred dollars, if he had two hundred at once. The money was sent and the leaven began to work. Another two hundred followed shortly afterwards. When all was ready the Senator and his spouse descended upon their home. Instead of dead cats and other missiles, a delegation of leading citizens were drawn up in line. A band played martial airs as the train drew into the platform. The cane—a gold-headed one—was presented with due eclat and responded for with many blushes, and that night the politician's wife was the happiest woman in the constituency.

The illness of Secretary Sherman has given rise to an impression that he will soon retire from public life, and it is suggested that Mark Hanna may take his place in the cabinet. That is an unwarrantable assumption, however, for Hanna does not want the place. At least, not now. A well-informed politician was discussing with me recently the manner of Sherman's appointment, and denied with apparent good reason the old story that it had been made to give the opportunity for Hanna's senatorial ambition. It seems McKinley had relied on Senator Allison to be his Secretary of State. He has known the Iowan banker a long time, and his methods have always been agreeable to the President. But Allison, after procrastinating a long time, finally decided to remain in the Senate, whereupon the President made that much talked of trip from Canton to Cleveland to discuss the situation with his most intimate advisors. Several names were mentioned for Secretary, McKinley declaring at once for Sherman. There was considerable objection, but there was no answer to McKinley's pertinent question: Who else? There were reasons against Whitelaw Reid, Phelps and the others mentioned, and, perforce, it had to be Sherman. At that time Hanna had no designs on the Senate. Indeed, at Zanesville some time before, an armed truce had been declared between Foraker and Hanna, the object of which was a united delegation for McKinley at St. Louis. There were trades and concessions on a grand scale then, and had such a contingency been expected there is no doubt the Foraker men would have claimed the succession. The treaty then signed left the Senatorial question out, so it is safe to believe that Foraker expected Sherman to hold his seat. From all appearances Hanna will prevail over his enemies at the forthcoming election and will certainly succeed himself in the Senate.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The impression that paper-chasing is a pursuit for dudes and dudines is ruthlessly dissipated by the facts. It is a hard and dangerous form of enjoyment, and takes it out both of riders and horses. Imagine galloping over the hills and through the valleys of Marin County at full speed, dashing over ditches and obstructions at a tremendous pace all for the fun of reaching the flags first and winning a silver cup. Of course the joys of victory are far above the reward, but the winning is no joke. Steady nerves are required to guide a pony down the steep and slippery sides of the San Rafael hills, and the paper-chasers gallop down these inclines as though they were on asphalt or turf. The wonder is there have been no accidents, but this is good fortune, not absence of opportunity. However, any gentleman of commercial or athletic distinction who imagines he can poke fun at this paper-chasing as an effeminate pursuit is invited to use his eyes on it, or to participate once or twice. He won't have another word to say on that phase of the subject. The hunt last week was really a brilliant affair. The Ingleside Cups were for the winners, and for love or money you could not hire a rig in the county. Equipages of all sorts and conditions were gathered round the Hotel Rafael, and the scene was very smart and full of animation and movement. The hounds tore off eagerly at 4 o'clock and pursued the paper over a magnificent course which kept them well in view of the cavalcade of carriages which drove along the Petaluma road to the Lucas place, where the finish had been arranged. There must have been miles of equipages strung along the line, and the effect was quite original. The finish was very exciting. Dr. Howitt, on one of Frank Johnson's horses, had led the chase all the way, but at the end was deceived by a blind. This gave Mr. Sweetser, a rancher of the environment, his opportunity and he dashed in first, with Mr. Murray, one of the District Attorneys of the county, second. Miss Moffitt of Oakland who is a daring rider, won the ladies' prize, with Miss Bruce next. It was very exciting to see the riders dash in at the finish and well worth the trip. But one accident marred the pleasure of the day—a plucky lad, Jessie de Bruhl, was thrown at the very last ditch and had his wrist broken. He stood the pain like a Spartan, however, and was promptly cared for. Altogether the affair was both brilliant and interesting, and I anticipate an equally exciting contest when the cups presented by the California Jockey Club are raced for.

Life is not always without its compensations even in San Francisco, provided one is an artist and has a studio over in the Latin Quarter of the town. Things happen over there—things that are grave and gay, and even, occasionally, humorous. Bruce Porter has some very good yarns that have come from this place, and if his tales be true has met some very queer characters. His latest find is a model, a girl of about twenty, who has the utmost and sincerest belief in the old Greek religion; has adopted it, in fact, instead of the Catholicism to which she was born. The way Mr. Porter discovered this queer kink in her character is a story by itself. It sems he had this girl posing for the principal figure in an "Annunciation." She failed to throw the proper amount of spirituality into her attitude and expression, and after several attempts at betterment Porter suddenly exclaimed: "See here, suppose now the angel of the Lord were suddenly to appear here before you, how would you act?" With that the girl turned to him and calmly enquired: "Say, what church do you belong to?"

The mysteries of the Civil Service are being generously exploited both at the Mint and at the Internal Revenue Office. One learns of the operations of law by experience, but most of the ladies and gentlemen who imagined themselves safe from interference and comfortably provided for during the rest of their days are finding they had calculated without their hosts. Take the Mint, for instance. The Government has recently suspended the coinage of silver dollars, and in consequence it became necessary to reduce the force. It was assumed, of course, that the people to go would be the temporary employes retained for the silver department. The order came from Washington just prior to the retirement of Superintendent Daggett. He offered to relieve Mr. Leach of the disagreeable task, and the new incumbent was glad to take advantage of his kindness. Subsequently it transpired that it was not from generous impulses that the offer was made, but rather with the intention of winding up certain political enemies. Daggett never forgets. Coolly and calmly he suspended all the men and women who had been installed in the Mint at the request of his enemies, writing the orders of departure in each instance with his own fair hands. Among these were several individuals there by favor of Governor Budd, besides every member of Coiner Spotts force who could be disturbed with impunity. There was a great outcry over the affair when it developed, and Mr. Daggett knew several moments of happiness. This gentleman has now retired to Alameda County, the Republican home of Democratic statesmen, where he will mingle business with pleasure; his business being attending to mining interests, and his pleasure assisting at the discomfiture of his political enemies.

The Civil Service Commissioners were holding an examination for the office of Janitor in the Custom House. Among the applicants was Pat Smith, an ambitious political Irishman. He was struggling with the solemnity of the occasion and answering the interrogatories as best he knew how. After replying to ten erudite inquiries and being bathed in perspiration by the effort, he was finally floored by one of the examiners, who asked: "Do you know, sir, the distance the sun is from the earth?" He replied: "Indeed, an' I don't know how many miles there be, but I'll bet 'tis not near enough to interfere wid my duties as Janitor."

Nothing a local School Board has done in years has aroused such indignation as the new text-book order. The idea of saddling this community in these hard times with additional burdens is a brutal outrage, for which there should be devised some suitable penalty. Unfortunately, Dr. Ragan, who, with Director Waller, has the direction of the movement, is not sensitive to personal comment, and mere newspaper denunciation effects no purpose. Prior to his entrance into politics Dr. Ragan enjoyed some repute as a physician, being a practitioner of no great skill but of some respectability. Since he has participated in the affairs of San Francisco, however, there has been no job too scaly for his undertaking. It sems a pity there should be no social penalty for misconduct in office. The community that is outraged by such men as Ragan, Waller and their colleagues should boycott them, just as it should refuse to patronize in a business way those Supervisors who prostitute their office to bribe-taking. If a Supervisor or School Director at the end of his term of office has escaped San Quentin he is safe from all other consequences, inasmuch as his neighbors treat him as well as the community does his honorable colleague who had come out poor. If it should be determined to send such fellows to coventry, if we decided that Supervisors Devany and Haskins were men to whom no honest gentleman could afford to speak, I'll warrant they'd find boodling unprofitable.

The professional standing of the educational boss, Dr. Ragan, was being freely discussed by a group of medical men who had got to know of his existence through the exposures of the press. "Who is this Ragan, anyhow?" asked one doctor of the crowd. "Where was he educated—where are his degrees?" "Oh," said another, "Ragan's a surgeon, and his degree legally entitles him to varnish a wooden leg."

The Maguire boom has subsided as rapidly as it commenced. Those who knew the strange ways of the Congressman realized he could not be defeated by obvious opposition, but that his extraordinary lack of judgment would inevitably compass his overthrow. He selected as standard-bearers men who were veritable political pall-bearers. With such direction his failure was inevitable. Besides, there lurked in the public mind an impression that the place of Congressman Maguire was in Congress, and he had no business in California while that body was in session. On his return he also submitted to a banquet tendered by a silver club, which invited a lot of people at one dollar a head to eat to the glory of Maguire. Here everyone and anyone spoke, and the consequence of it all is that Maguire's candidacy is considerably cheapened. He had launched out his career a year before the campaign, and like a flower that blooms

The Davis will case is on the verge of a conclusion, and no one will be sorry. The contest has taken a good deal of newspaper space, but the evidence against the document discovered in the urn has a futility which is exasperating. The late Jacob Z. Davis was a man who may be supposed to have known his mind, and in disposing of his property he simply followed the intention he had so often declared to his friends, and especially to his partner, Mr. Boyd. Of course, whenever there arises an issue of facts there is always a chance for doubt, and the interest of one side or the other is directed at discrediting men whose characters had hitherto been unimpeachable. That is to be expected, however. All the surrounding conditions and statements point to the genuineness of the document, and to my mind the fact that there are minor circumstances demanding explanation about the finding of the will, is in itself testimony of its good faith. The individual clever enough to put such a scheme through would have seen to it there are no flaws. It is the perfectly natural condition that is always questionable. However, the jury will have now its chance of determination and we must await the verdict.

The State University at Berkeley opened its doors to its freshman class on Monday of this week, the work for upper classmen beginning on Wednesday or Thursday. There can be no doubt that the U. C. is booming right ahead under all steam, with the monkey wrench on the safety valve and everything wide open. The record for big freshman classes is broken regularly each succeeding year, and it is a matter of wonder how the State college can manage to take care of the tremendous and increasing surplus. One move in this direction has been the addition to the gymnasium building, or annex rather, and it is being constructed for the accommodation of the co-eds. This is nearly completed, and contains lockers and dressing rooms for about three hundred students. The new chemical laboratory, which it was promised would be ready for occupancy with the opening of the fall term, has hardly passed its first stage of construction, and no one knows how the students in that department are to be taken care of. An addition to the mining building has also been started, but has not yet got further than a pile of lumber and a few barrels of cement. The University battalion, by the way, is to have a new commander. Lieutenant Cloman, U. S. A., has been appointed in Lieut. Winn's place, and will put the new comers through their course of sprouts on Thursday. Already the football enthusiasts are asking whether or not the new lieutenant will allow the campus gridiron to be fenced in this year. This question has always been a bone of contention between the student body and "the Lieut.," as the latter official invariably persists in regarding the campus as a parade ground. It would be a graceful concession on Lieut. Cloman's part to permit the erection of this fence. It would undoubtedly ensure his popularity, and would in no wise hamper the company and battalion drills.

Speaker Reed objects strongly to the ex-members of the House who find lobbying more profitable than practice in ordinary courts of law or business in the States from which they come to Congress. He thinks the sooner ex-members are denied the privilege of the floor the better it will be for the House in general.

A STAINED-GLASS ARTIST

The Old-Time Studio in Which Bruce Porter Composes Windows.

Another of Les Jeunes is to follow in the flight of "The Lark" within the next few weeks, but his flitting is to be even further afield than was that of Mr. Burgess or of Earnest Peixotto. Bruce Porter is the latest of the younger generation of artists to set his face Eastward, but he does not intend to stop until he reaches Southern France or Northern Italy.

To design and execute the most difficult as well as the most beautiful stained windows, and at the same time to bring all of the material from New York, has been Mr. Porter's labor during the time he has worked at his profession in San Francisco. It is really herculean. As Mr. Porter puts it, it is like trying to paint a picture in San Francisco with a palette which is in New York—one has to reach across the whole continent for the colors. In face of this difficulty it speaks volumes for Bruce Porter's persistent adherence to what was best, that he has steadily refused to execute the cheaper, easier designs with which a certain class of San Franciscans are ever ready to fill their houses and has always elected the infinitely more difficult task of producing colored windows that should be the best of their kind—from the point of view of the material at least. Some idea of the difficulties to be overcome may be guessed from the fact that in all cases the glass used by Mr. Porter has been colored while it was actually in a fused state, and he showed me one window in which real ametnysts had actually been employed. So careful is Mr. Porter in the matter of color effect that it is no unusual occurrence for him to break up a whole sheet of glass for the sake of obtaining one certain spot of color perhaps not bigger than a silver dollar.

But San Francisco is proverbially slow to appreciate good work done at its doors, and there are not many of its people who would be willing to believe that one of the best designers of stained windows in America has been quietly at work in the quaint old building on Jackson street. Mr. Porter has as yet accomplished comparatively little, but that little is of a conception so imaginative, a taste so unerring and a workmanship so faultless that it will rank with the very best efforts of almost any artist in America. Most of Mr. Porter's work has stayed in this city, as, for instance, tne windows in the Gibbs house and the Bourne house, and those in the hallway of Mr. William Crocker's residence. All the windows in the University Club are from Mr. Porter's studio, while the window he considers his most successful handiwork is to be seen in Mr. Adam Grant's house. It was Bruce Porter as well who designed the windows in the Swedenborgian Church in this city, and also the exquisite panels in the Church of St. Mary's by the Sea at Pacific Grove.

Mr. Porter has of late been at work upon the interior of the Bourne house on Pacific Heights, and, in fact, one of the reasons for his departure is to collect material for its further interior decoration. At the same time, however, he anticipates doing a good deal of painting and studying on his own account. The difficulty of obtaining models in San Francisco is always great, and besides this, this artist is convinced that he will do himself full justice only when quite alone and isolated from his fellows and friends. He will be gone some three years, at the end of which time he expects to return to San Francisco, and prophesies that all of Les Jeunes who are at present hurrying away from their native city will sooner or later do the same.

It is encouraging to hear from such an authority as Mr. Porter how great is the superiority of American glass over that of European manufacture. The American glass is practically the only kind in which a good artist cares to work, and, in fact, for the better class of windows there is no comparison between the two makes. Mr. Porter is very proud of this superiority—as all of us should be—and believes it to be quite the biggest thing America has accomplished in an artistic way.

BRUCE PORTER IN HIS STUDIO

The Argentine Republic has taken legal means to secure a due increase in population. A few months ago the Legislature passed an Act making it illegal to reject, without legitimate motive, an offer of mariage, the fines imposed going to the man or woman whose offer has been refused. Twenty is the age at which the unmarried are to be convicted, and eighty the age when the fines are to cease. The Act provides that every male from the ages of twenty to eighty shall pay a tax till he marries, and pay it once a month.

The Rand (South Africa) output of gold for June last was 251,529 ounces, an increase of 57,889 ounces over that for the same month last year. The returns of the district continue to advance steadily and prospects continue to be bright, acording to all reliable reports. Gold is being won at less cost than it was a year ago, and President Kruger has decided to make concessions to the mining industry that will prove of much benefit.

The traffic and financial schemes of the Suez Canal for 1896 afford evidence of continued development. A total of 8,560,000 tons of shipping passed through the canal as against 8,448,000 tons in 1895. Of the total number of ships 63.4 per cent. were British, as compared with 67.5 in 1895, 71.2 in 1894 and 72 per cent. in 1893.

Latter-Day Happenings in London — The Crowd at Cowes.

The press dispatches relating to European affairs which go the round of the Saturday evening and Sunday morning papers usually bear the appearance of being concocted for the consumption of chambermaids and bar

A PANEL IN ST MARY'S BY THE SEA, PACIFIC GROVE

—not omitting corner grocery—politicians. The latest edition informed us that the yachting week at Cowes had been more or less a failure, owing to the absence of Emperor William. Some time ago we were informed through the same source that the Prince of Wales would not enter the Britannia against the Meteor. The demands of the jubilee on the energies of society no doubt tended to lessen the attendance, but, in the present state of feeling towards the Kaiser, his absence was a cause for congratulation. The Prince is too good a sportsman and possessed of too much tact to exhibit the spirit ascribed to him, and accordingly the royal yachts were seen sailing in the competitions with varying success. As for the feeling alleged to exist between the Prince and his imperial nephew, I see the former has accepted an invitation to be present at the autumn maneuvers of the German army as the guest of the latter.

His Majesty Chulalongkorn, of Siam, has been well advised in deferring his visit to England until after the jubilee ceremonies, and so avoiding getting lost in the crowd. Having studied the English language from his childhood he has an advantage not generally possessed by Oriental personages, and he seems likely to leave a favorable impression behind him. The serious purpose of his visit to Europe is to gather ideas, and incidentally capital, if possible, for the development of his country by the building of railways, the working of mines and the extension of manufacturing and mechanical processes. His sons are being educated and trained by English and German tutors and military and naval officers.

A once well-known figure in the world of finance lately passed away in the person of Lord Revelstoke, the head of the firm of Baring Brothers & Co. at the time of their suspension in 1890. At the time the total liabilities of the house amounted to £21,000,000 sterling, which, under the guarantee of the Bank of England, the London banks generally and leading financial houses were liquidated without loss in the space of four years. The late nobleman was a masterful man, and to his mistakes in the conduct of the business the downfall of the firm has always been ascribed.

A great deal has been said about the important service rendered by German officers in the Turkish army during the late war. G. W. Steevens, of the "Daily Mail" (London), who was all through the campaign, has published a very entertaining article in July "Blackwood's Magazine," in which he states that Grumbkow Pasha was the only German officer present. After remaining four days at the top of the Meluna Pass, and making suggestions which were not followed, Grumbkow retired from the field.

The "Athenaeum" states that after the first edition of the late Jean Ingelow's poems had been published, the authoress called, with her mother, on Messrs. Longmans and suggested that a second thousand should be printed. The firm, however, declined to accede to the proposal, and the ladies retired. Before they had left the house a bookseller came in and gave Messrs. Longmans an order for five hundred copies. Miss Ingelow was recalled and informed that the firm would reconsider their determination, and in the first year four editions of a thousand copies each were sold.

The navigation of the upper firmament is a problem that many men of note in the world of mechanical science believe capable of solution. In all parts of the world the question is receiving the closest study. The theoretical principles of artificial flight may be said to be well understood, and the progress that has been made towards constructing a practical flying-machine by Maxim and others encourages the belief that in no great while men will be flying through the air. In furtherance of the present active interest in the subject the Aeronautical Society of Great Britain has lately been reorganized, with Captain E. Baden-Powell as Secretary, and a quarterly journal, giving all the latest information, is now issued by the Society.

Visitors to India are always impressed by the bearing of the magnificent Sikh guardians of the gate of Government House, Calcutta. These fellows are in action what they are in appearance. In the recent fight at Maizar a Sikh orderly picked up a gun weighing two hundred pounds single-handed and carried it to the gun mule. The mule was shot dead, so he carried it to the relief mule. Then he went back and brought in the body of Lieutenant Cruickshank, who had been killed.

The circulation of the London weekly "Tit Bits," which was first started in 1891, is said to have reached 14,551,908 copies for the first six months of the present year, and the "Strand Magazine," issued by the same publishers, now sells to the extent of 450,000 copies every month. The proprietors and publishers of these and other well-known serials, George Newnes, Limited, have recently incorporated with a capital of £1,000,000, their net profits for the year ending 30 June, 1897, being stated as £66,698. The enterprise first began with the publication of "Tit Bits," sixteen years ago.

The leading English journals scout the proposals that have been put forward in Canada for legislation against the admission of Americans to the Northwest for mining purposes. The "Spectator" dismisses the idea with the remark that it is nonsense.

In "A Woman's Part in a Revolution" Mrs. John Hays Hammond tells how her little son was digging in the garden when the dynamite explosion wrecked a big slice of the Johannesburg suburbs. Jacky took his aunt aside: "Aunt Bet, I heard that great big noise when I was digging and I thought I had dug up hell." This must have been about the sensation of Secretary Sherman when he read the impressions created in Spain and England by the accounts of his digging into foreign affairs with the reporters.

A Reversion to Type.

BY FRANK NORRIS

Schuster was too damned cheeky. He was the floor-walker in a department-store on Kearny street, and I had opportunity to observe his cheek upon each of the few occasions on which I went into that store with—— let us say my cousin. A floor-walker should let his communications be "first aisle left," or "elevator, second floor front," or "third counter right," for whatsoever is more than this cometh of evil. But Schuster used to come up to——my cousin, and take her gently by the hand and ask her how she did, and if she was to be out of town much that season, and tell her, with mild reproach in his eye, that she had been quite a stranger of late, while I stood in the background mumbling curses not loud but deep.

However, my cousin does not figure in this yarn, nor myself. Paul Schuster is the hero — Paul Schuster, floor-walker in a department-store that sold ribbons and lace and corsets and other things, fancy, now! He was hopelessly commonplace, lived with a maiden aunt and a parrot in two rooms, way out in the bleak streets around Lone Mountain. When on duty he wore a long black cutaway coat, a white pique four-in-hand (from the wash goods counter), and blue-gray "pants" that cost four dollars. Besides this he parted his hair on the side and entertained ideas on culture and refinement. His father had been a barber in the Palace Hotel barber shop.

Paul Schuster had never heard anything of a grandfather.

Schuster came to that department-store when he was about thirty. Five years passed; then ten — he was there yet — forty years old by now. Always in a black cutaway and white tie, always with his hair parted on one side, always with the same damned cheek. A floor-walker, respectable as an English barrister, steady as an eight-day clock, a figure known to every woman in San Francisco. He had lived a floor-walker; as a floor-walker he would die. Such he was at forty. At forty-one he fell. Piff! paff! two days and all was over.

It sometimes happens that a man will live a sober, steady, respectable, commonplace life for forty, fifty, or even sixty years, and then, without the least sign of warning, suddenly go counter to every habit, to every trait of character and every rule of conduct he has been believed to possess. The thing only happens to intensely respectable gentlemen, of domestic tastes and narrow horizons, who are just preparing to become old. Perhaps it is a last revolt of a restrained youth — the final protest of vigorous, heady blood, too long dammed up. Whatever it may be, I am sure you can recall two or three instances of men (of your acquaintance, perhaps) who have bolted in this fashion. This bolting season does not last very long. It comes upon a man between the ages of forty and fifty-five, and while it lasts the man should be watched more closely than a young fellow in his sophomore year at college. The vagaries of a sophomore need not be taken any more seriously than the skittishness of a colt, but when a fifty-year-old bolts, stand clear!

On the second of May — two months and a day after his forty-first birthday—Paul Schuster bolted. It came upon him with the quickness of a cataclysm, like the sudden, abrupt development of latent mania. For a week he had been feeling ill at ease—restless; a vague discomfort hedged him in like an ill-fitting garment; he felt the moving of his blood in his wrists and his temples. A subtle desire to do something, he knew not what, bit and nibbled at his brain like the tooth of a tiny unfamiliar rodent.

On the second of May, at twenty minutes after six, Schuster came out of the store at the tail end of the little army of home-bound clerks. He locked the door behind him, according to custom, and stood for a moment on the asphalt, his hands in his pockets, fumbling his month's pay. Then he said to himself, nodding his head resolutely:

"Tonight I shall get drunk — as drunk as I possibly can. I shall go to the most disreputable resorts I can find—I shall know the meaning of wine, of street fights, of women, of gaming, of jolly companions, of noisy midnight suppers. I'll do the town, or by God, the town will do me. Nothing shall stop me, and I will stop at nothing. Here goes!"

Now, if Paul Schuster had only been himself this bolt of his would have brought him to nothing worse than the Police Court, and would have lasted but twenty-four hours at the outside. But Schuster, like all the rest of us, was not merely himself. He was his ancestors as well. In him as in you and I, were generations — countless generations — of forefathers. Schuster had in him the characteristics of his father, the Palace Hotel barber, but also, he had the unknown characteristics of his grandfatner, of whom he had never heard, and his great-grandfather, likewise ignored. It is rather a serious matter to thrust yourself under the dominion of unknown, unknowable impulses and passions. This is what Schuster did that night. Getting drunk was an impulse belonging to himself; but who knows what "inherited tendencies," until then dormant, the alcohol unleashed within him? Something like this must have happened to have accounted for what follows.

Schuster went straight to the Palace Hotel bar, where he had cocktails, thence to the Poodle Dog, where he had a French dinner and champagne, thence (you will understand the fellow was acting on blind caprice) to the Barbary Coast on upper Kearny street, and drank whiskey that rasped his throat like gulps of carpet tacks. Then, realizing that San Francisco was his own principality and its inhabitants his vassals, he hired a carriage and drove to the Cliff House, and poured champagne into the piano in the public parlor. A waiter remonstrated, and Paul Schuster, floor-walker and respectable citizen, bowled him down with a catsup bottle and stamped upon his abdomen. At the beginning of that evening he belonged to that class whom policemen are paid to protect. When he walked out of the Cliff House he was a freebooter seven feet tall, with a chest expansion of fifty inches. He paid the hack-driver a double fare and strode away into the night and plunged into the waste of sand dunes that stretch back from the beach on the other side of the Park.

It never could be found out what happened to Schuster, or what he did, during the next ten hours. We pick him up again in a saloon on the waterfront about noon the next day, with thirty dollars in his pocket and God knows what disorderly notions in his poor, crazed wits. But remember one thing: at this time he was sober as far as the alcohol went. What the other trouble was that buzzed and bubbled in his skull, judge you. It might be supposed that now would have been the time for reflection and repentance and a return to home and respectability. Return home! Not much! Schuster had began to wonder what kind of an ass he had been to have walked the floor of a department-store for the last score of years. Something was boiling in his veins. B-r-r-r! Let 'em all stand far from him now!

That day he left San Francisco and rode the blind baggage as far as Colfax on the Overland. He chose Colfax because he saw the name chalked on a freight car at the Oakland mole. At Colfax, within three hours after his arrival, he fought with a restaurant man over the question of a broken saucer, and the same evening was told to leave the town by the sheriff.

Out of Colfax, some twenty-eight miles into the mountains, are placer gold mines, having for headquarters a one-street town called Iowa Hill. Schuster went over to the Hill the same day on the stage. The stage got in at night and pulled up in front of the postoffice. Schuster went into the postoffice, which was also a Wells-Fargo office, a candy store, a drug store, a cigar store, and a lounging-room, and asked about hotels.

Only the postmaster was in at that time, but as Schuster leaned across the counter, talking to him, a young man came in, with a huge spur on his left boot-heel. He and the postmaster nodded, and the young man slid an oblong object about the size of a brick across the counter. The object was wrapped in newspaper and seemed altogether too heavy for anything but metal — metal of the precious kind, for example.

"He?" answered the postmaster to Schuster, when the young man had gone. "He's the superintendent of the Little Bear mine on the other side of the American river, about three miles by the trail."

For the next week Schuster set himself to work to solve the problem of how a man might obtain a shotgun in the vicinity of Iowa Hill without the fact being remembered afterward and the man identified. It seemed good to him after a while to steal the gun from a couple of Chinamen who were washing gravel along the banks of the American about two miles below the Little Bear. For two days he lay in the tall weed and witch hazel on the side of the canyon overlooking the cabin, noted the time when both Chinamen were sufficiely far away, and stole the gun, together with a saw and a handful of cartridges loaded with buckshot. Within the next week he sawed off the gun-barrel a sufficiently short, experimented once or twice with the buckshot, and found occasion to reconnoiter every step of the trail that led from the Little Bear to Iowa Hill. Also, he found out at the bar of the hotel at the Hill that the superintendent of the Little Bear amalgamated and retorted the cleanup on Sundays. When he had made sure of this Schuster was seen no more about that little one-street mining town.

"He says it's Sunday," said Paul Schuster to himself; "but that's why it's probably Saturday or Monday. He ain't going to have the town know when he brings the brick over. It might even be Friday. I'll make it a four-night watch."

There is a nasty bit on the trail from the Little Bear to the Hill, steep as a staircase, narrow as a rabbit-run, and overhung with manzanita. The place is trumpet-mouthed in shape, and sound carries far. So, on the second night of his watch, Schuster could at last plainly hear the certain sounds that he had been waiting for—sounds that jarred sharply on the prolonged roll of the Morning Star's stamps, a quarter of a mile beyond the canyon. The sounds were those of a horse threshing through the gravel and shallow water of the ford in the river just below. He heard the horse grunt as he took the slope of the nearer bank, and the voice of his rider speaking to him came distinctly to his ears. Then silence for one—two—three minutes, while the stamp mill at the Morning Star purred and rumbled unceasingly and Schuster's heart pumped thickly in his throat. Then a blackness blacker than that of the night heaved suddenly against the gray of the sky, close in upon him, and a pebble clicked beneath a shod hoof.

"Pull up!" Schuster was in the midst of the trail, his cheek caressing the varnished stock.

"Whoa! Steady there! What in hell——"

"Pull up. You know what's wanted. Chuck us that brick."

"Stand clear there, God damn you! I'll ride you down!"

The stock leaped fiercely in Schuster's arm-pit, nearly knocking him down, and, in the light of two parallel flashes, he saw an instantaneous picture — rugged sky-line, red-tinted manzanita bushes, the plunging mane and head of a horse, and above it a Face with open mouth and staring eyes, smoke-wreathed and hatless. The empty stirrup thrashed across Schuster's body as the horse scraped by him, The trail was dark in front of him. He could see nothing. But soon he heard a little bubbling noise and a hiccough. Then all fell quiet again.

"I got you, all right!"

Thus Schuster, the ex-floor-walker, whose part hitherto in his little life-drama had been to say, "first aisle left," "elevator, second floor," "first counter right."

Then he went down on his knees, groping at the warm bundle in front of him. But he found no brick. It had never occurred to him that the superintendent might ride over to town for other reasons than merely to ship the week's cleanup. He struck a light and looked more closely — looked at the man he had shot. He could not tell whether it was the superintendent or not, for various reasons, but chiefly because the barrels of the gun had been sawn off, the gun loaded with buckshot, and both barrels fired simultaneously at close range.

Men coming over the trail from the Hill the next morning found a good deal of the young superintendent, and spread the report of what had befallen him.

When the Prodigal Son became hungry he came to himself. So it was with Schuster. Living on two slices of bacon per day (eaten raw for fear of kindling fires) is what might be called starving under difficulties, and within a week Schuster was remembering and longing for floor-walking and respectability. Within a month of his strange disappearance he was back in San Francisco again knocking at the door of his aunt's house on Geary street. A week later he was taken on again at his old store, in his old position, his unexcused absence being at length, and under protest, condoned by a remembrance of "long and faithful service."

Schuster picked up his old life again precisely where he had left it on the second of May, six weeks previously—picked it up and stayed by it, calmly, steadily, uneventfully. For him the incident was closed. I do not know how he explained it to himself. But the day before he died he told this story to his maiden aunt, who told it to me, with the remark that it was, of course, an absurd lie. Perhaps it is. I'm sure I can't say.

One thing, however, remains to tell. I repeated the absurd lie to a friend of mine who is in the warden's office over at the prison of San Quentin. I mentioned Schuster's name.

"Schuster! Schuster!" he repeated; "why we had a Schuster over here once—a long time ago, though. An old fellow he was, and a bad egg, too. Commuted for life, though. Son was a barber at the Palace Hotel."

"What was old Schuster up for?" I asked.

"Highway robbery," said my friend.

Whatever may be England's attitude toward us Americans, there can be no doubt as to Yvette Guilbert's. She hates and loathes and abominates us, heartily. An unfortunate correspondent of the New York Journal, who dropped into her dressing-room at the "Ambassadors" the other night, in the hopes of a pleasant little chat, was met by a scathing torrent of abuse, and was glad to escape with a whole skin. Yvette was furious beyond words because of her treatment in New York on the occasion of her last visit. It is quite possible that Yvette is becoming a back number, that the public is tired of her. Anyhow, she says the American public make her tired. The trouble began when a young man, name unknown, came to her in New York with the story that he could get a book of his (dealing with Yvette's life) accepted by the publishers provided only she would allow him to use her pictures and would write a preface for it. He said he was poor and wanted a lift. Yvette Guilbert gave him the lift without, unfortunately for her, reading the book. When it appeared the book was a rather scurrilous account of some shady passages in her life with allusions to a certain risque affair with Dr. Schiller. Hinc illae lacrimae. For there were lacrimae of rage on Yvette's part.

There is a tradition of old colonial days that when English rule displaced that of Holland and the speaking of the English language in school was made compulsory on little Dutch children in New York, a master devised a plan to make the scheme work. He gave a check made of metal to the first boy who spoke Dutch, and this boy passed it on to the comrade who was next guilty of the offense, he to the next and so until closing time. The last holder then handed in the check, entitling him to a good, sound flogging, which he got.

MRS. CARTER AT HOME

Is Celebrated for Her Fame and Wears Stunning Gowns.

One was rather awestruck with No. 50. It was the kind of hotel room at which one rings, not knocks, and thereafter is "ushered into an ante-chamber" by the maid. Inside, beyond the ante-room, where turee Gargantuan trunks, bundles (not bunches, you know), bundles of flowers, and Mrs. Carter, Mrs. Carter who of late has become so celebrated on account of her fame.

Laura Jean Libby would have said that Mrs. Carter was dressed in "some soft, clinging stuff"; and so, precisely, she was; lace like soapsuds and silk that had a glimmer on it like wet asphalt. But that dress, or tea-gown, or peignoir (of course it wasn't a peignoir, though), or whatever it was, had as much form and shape as a spilled plate of mush. It was all blooming mass and color, no outline at all, and on top of this heap of pale, indeterminate tints Mrs. Carter's hair flamed up with an effect that was somehow brusque and abrupt, as if some one had suddenly turned up the gas.

Mrs. Carter is very tall; carries that gold-girdled head of hers six feet from the ground, I'm thinking, and is very graceful in a strange, stiff way—just as a tall, stiff reed is graceful. But she is not pretty to my notion. No, as I recall her, she is not pretty. One would have had her face a little fuller and not quite so tired looking, and her nose might have been a little littler, and her eyebrows not so heavy. But I suspect one sees Mrs. Leslie Carter at a disadvantage when she is off the stage. She impressed me as if seen out of her element in No. 50. I was continually drawing an imaginary line of footlights between us. We sat down, Mrs. Carter with her back to the mirror. Interviewing Mrs. Carter is interviewing made easy, for she did all the talking. There was nothing for me to do but to put in an occasional word, just to keep her going. I suppose she has been interviewed so much, poor lady, that she knows just what to say without being asked. Some wretch, I think, must have told her to be ready on the subject of "climate," for she started off on that with a rush, and had got so far as fruits and flowers before I could stop her. All through our talk she was continually bolting up that worn, worn road.

Never have I seen an actress so anxious over her reception. Mrs. Carter asked me all manner of questions as to the temper of San Francisco audiences, regularly interviewed me on the subject, and seemed mighty ill at ease over the matter of the four weeks' run of the "Heart of Maryland."

"I am absurdly superstitious," says she. "You know I'm from the South, from Kentucky, and I believe in omens and signs and all the rest, but only in the bad ones, in the ill-omens. I suppose it's safest. Do you know," she exclaimed, suddenly, "I believe your fogs out here are actually doing my voice a world of good. Oh, this cli—"

I leaped into the breach. "Your voice!' I shouted. "Fogs, you say! Now that's curious."

"Why, I've been working ever since 10 this morning (at this time it was after 7) with my voice raised all the time, and I'm not a bit hoarse. Do you think I'm hoarse?"

I spread my palms toward her.

"No, not in the least," she went on. "Now, nowhere else could I do that. And Monterey? Oh, talk to me about Monterey and Del Monte! I went there for a rest, you know, and the weather there (the danger flag was out) was absolutely perfect. Oh, I shall live in California some day. Such a climate I never—(I knew it was coming.)

"Yes, of course," I shrieked. "Talk to me about the 'Heart of Maryland.' Don't you swing from the clapper of a bell somewhere?"

Mrs. Carter put this aside lightly.

"Yes, yes, but that's just a little sensation. I like this play, this Maryland, better than any play I ever acted in" (caution—they all say this of their latest play, so make allowances), "and you know I don't say it for mere advertising effect" (they always add this remark, too), "but the more I play it the better I like it. The climax of the second act is really one of the strongest things on the American stage. I do so hope you will like the play."

"Of course I'll like it," said I.

"If a hammer falls behind a flat during a scene you won't," said Mrs. Carter, "and if a calcium light don't go just right you'll say the piece lacks 'unity of conception.' Oh, I know what critics are. And on first nights with the best management some one little thing is sure to happen. I wish we could do away with first nights and begin with seconds, or even thirds.'

"Or with the last night and work backward."

And with this I got up and worked backward myself toward the door.

"If you like 'Maryland' come and see me again and tell me about it," said Mrs. Carter.

"And if I don't like it?"

"Then you musn't come."

"I shall be frantic in my enthusiasm Monday night," said I. F. M.

What the Rothschilds are to Europe the Sassoons are to the Orient. The two brothers, Sir Edward and Sir Albert, control the entire financial market of the East, and it is acording to their decision whether or not wars are waged, navies built, or palaces erected in the score of little kingdoms and principalities of India, Persia, Southern Asia and Africa. The home of the elder Sassoon was for a time a veritable fairy palace called "Sans Souci," in Bombay, India, but just lately he has migrated to London and brought himself into public notice by the purchase of Barney Barnato's extraordinary mansion that London calls "Barnato's Folly." The Sassoons come from Bagdad and were originally Mesopotamian Jews. This firm has been in existence for over two centuries, and yet in spite of the almost continual state of petty warfare and brigandage that has raged around their headquarters, there has never been any attempt to pillage or loot their enormous treasure. It is known that the Sassoons never forget or forgive an injury, and the Maharajahs, Mandarins and head men who are their clients have found that in the long run it pays to stand well with the men who can afford them means of paying their troops, indulging their whims, and maintaining their harems. In consequence of this a passport signed by the Sassoons will guarantee the bearer safe passage in sections of country where an imperial ukase of the Czar of all the Russias would be used to light a campfire or clean a gun.

MRS. LESLIE CARTER

The most peculiar side of this unusual banking buisness is that much of the money is loaned out upon merely personal security. Hardly more that a verbal agreement is made, but for all that the losses of the Sassoons have been ridiculously small when compared to those suffered yearly by any bank in Europe or America. The traders, however, know their men, and "to fail tne Sassoons" would be like expulsion from a Board of Trade or Chamber of Commerce. The swindler would be dead financially thereafter. Sir Edward Sassoon has but recently married the daughter of Gustave Rothschild, a somewhat portentious match, since a union of the finances of these two great houses would practically control the European world. Sir Edward has an uncle, Reuben, who is a great crony of the Prince of Wales, and a well-known figure in London society, and who also has married a Rothschild.

Mr. Richard Harding Davis is having another brush with the critics, this time over some statements anent the United States Senate Chamber published in the August "Harpers." Van Bibber has his own way of looking at things, no doubt, but his vision is either sadly wanting in accuracy or his imagination in restraint. He has given a discription of the venerable hall of legislation that would make Daniel Webster turn in his grave. Van Bibber has quite transformed and remodeled the chamber; he has hung pictures on the walls where pictures were never hung before; has draped flags over spaces hitherto uncovered; has created swinging doors on either side of the Vice-President's desk, and has covered them with leather, when heretofore they have been content to be mahogany and never thought of swinging. And, besides all this, in order, no doubt, to lend a festal apearance to the same, Mr. Davis has seen fit to plant a grove of trees in the sward just below the windows, and to have them all green and flourishing in March. Great are the wonders of genius.

Mr. Whitelaw Reid, editor of the New York "Tribune" and Jubilee Ambassador to the Court of England, is just back from London and is receiving the congratulations of his friends upon the wonderful scoop he effected for his paper when he published, exclusively, the official correspondence of Secretary Sherman and Ambassador Hay in the matter of the Behring Sea seal controversy, beating all the other New York papers. A reporter from one of these beaten rivals interviewed Mr. Reid upon the matter, and rather skillfully touched upon the fact that Mr. Reid used his office as United States Ambassador as a means to get news of the exclusive variety for his paper.

"Weren't you afraid," the reporter asked, "that it would look a little personal for this seal fishing correspondence in favor of your father-in-law's company to come out first in your paper before Washington had authorized its publication?"

Mr. Reid had nothing to say to this, and remarked that he would not talk to the papers until after he had made his official report at Washington as Jubilee Ambassador.

"Shall we be able to read it," asked the guileless reporter, "in the 'Tribune' the day before it is made public in Washington?"

But at this the great man withdrew — silence.

The original copy of the Declaration of Independence lies in the archives of the State Department, incased in glass and locked in a steel vault. It is carefully guarded and is shown to no one unless for some extraordinary reason. Up to three and a half years ago it hung in the showroom of the State Department, but having been exposed to bright light for many years the ink showed signs of fading, and as a means of preservation it was hermetically sealed between sheets of glass and put away in company with the original Constitution and the appeal of the colonists to King George.

The Roentgen ray is proving a valuable factor in diagnosing cardiac affections. Experiments have shown that the work performed by a sound heart had been greatly over-estimated, and the vibrations of a diseased heart are now easier to understand. It is possible to learn the size and position of the vital organ in cases where the former methods of ausculation and percussion had afforded them no help. The deterioration of the valves are observable at an early stage, and exact information has been gained as to the relations between the heart and the diaphragm.

MINES AND MINERS

Random Notes on the All-Absorbing Excitement of the Hour.

The tremendous dividends which the Rawhide mine is paying Captain Nevils have made him the potentate of Tuolumne County. The property employs a hundred and forty men regularly, and yields between fifty and eighty thousand dollars per month, half of which belongs to the Captain. He is a man of strong and determined personality, who has ample means to enable him to resist aught that savors of aggression on the part of his neighbors. He is dangerous to oppose and quite relentless in his determination to conquer an enemy. Some time ago he had a difference with certain stage lines. He retaliated by establishing a line of his own, took in the rivals, and now controls every stage and bus in the county. An electric light company displeased him, so he has erected a dam on the Tuolumne River and is establishing an electric plant of his own which will furnish power to the Rawhide, and incidentally to the environment—lighting Jamestown into the bargain. He has also a telephone system in Tuolumne which connects with the Sunset, and has quite beaten the local concern out of the field. It cannot be said he is popular, but certainly he prevails. He has his hands in every enterprise, is developing the region with a passionate force, and is altogether the great man on the mother lode.

Apropos of his popularity, he has rather a cynical disregard for public favor. Some weeks ago he had an argument with the Superintendent of his mine and both got angry. Nevils, who uses rather strong language without meaning it, called his opponent a "miserable beast." The man took him to task at once. "Look here," he said. "Quit that. No man talks that way to me." Nevils looked at him in surprise. "What! You don't object to that? Why, every man in Tuolumne calls me a brute, and I only laugh."

When two such positive personalities as Alvinza Hayward and Nevils meet a clash is certain. Hayward has a prospect adjoining the Rawhide, and has been troubled for some time with a desire to discover just how the leads run in order to save time in developing his own property. So he revived an old statute and instituted a suit against the Rawhide, claiming it was infringing on his ground, and that he was entitled to a formal survey of the works to decide the point at issue. He proposed that an employe of his own should examine the Rawhide and report to him. Judge Nichols granted the order but sent to San Francisco for the surveyor, who, being a man of integrity, declined to assist Hayward's purpose, whereupon the suit was dismissed. Nevils was immensely mad and vowed he would get even in some way or other. Events often turn aright for the consummation of such designs, and by some strange contingency fifteen large hogs which had been sent to the Rawhide died of cholera. Curious as it may seem, their carcases fell down Hayward's shaft, but no one has the faintest idea how it happened. Of course there are several ways of killing a cat, as the proverb says, but those who have conclusions are welcome to them.

Some weeks ago I wrote of the Dutch mine, a property on the mother lode which had been exploited by contributions from White House clerks. A score of young men contributed certain small sums per month out of their salaries for the development of the property, and after years of patient waiting rich ore was discovered. Now the property is producing between twenty-five and forty thousand per month. All the expenses of development and machinery have been paid, and the clerks are reaping in dividends, the benefits of their faith and foresight. There is rock in sight to keep up this return for years to come. In the same environment a Boston company is developing properties on a big scale and erecting the most expensive machinery known to mining. The Jumper's average is very high. Indeed, its owner, Mr. Gow, was at Sonora recently endeavoring to obtain a reduction in his assessment. He explained that there were many months in which the Jumper produced as little as $25,000 per month.

The news from Juneau and Dyea regarding the rush to the Northwestern gold fields is full of the difficulties which the large bodies of travelers to the Yukon district are meeting with. Means of transport for freight over the passes are altogether inadequate, as the small number of Indians available cannot handle the enormous quantity of goods brought into the country. Many prospectors are starting in lightly supplied, convincing those who have had experience already in that part of the world that later on in the year we shall be hearing of numerous cases of starvation and breakdown, with serious loss of life. Still, large numbers of passengers are leaving by every available steamer from coast ports, and nothing seems likely to stop the course of the travel northwards, even during the winter months. A vast number of people will undoubtedly be blocked on their road.

The Alaska Commercial Company is making arrangements to add to their service of ocean and river steamers next season, and the North American Transport and

It has been reported within the last two or three days that the Canadian Government will not enforce a royalty on gold mining, but that the surface extent of claims will be reduced from 500 to 100 feet, the discoverer being allowed 200 feet as a special privilege. This reduction of area seems to be generally approved of, as making room for a larger number of claims in a district. As to the royalty question, it is probable that it never got beyond the region of suggestion, and the fuss that has been made on the subject was quite uncalled for, seeing that no official act had been declared, and nothing of the kind exists in any part of British territory.

The Senior Wrangler of the year at Cambridge University, Mr. W. H. Austin, is the first Board-school boy to achieve the distinction, and his success is worthy of record from the social as well as the academic point of view. He was educated at a Birmingham Board-school, and subsequently went to a Grammar-school and Mason College in the same city before entering Trinity College, Cambridge, rather less than three years ago.

DEATH OF A BRAVE WOMAN

Margaret Culbertson and Her Work Among Chinatown's Dens.

A very good and a very brave woman died this week—Margaret Culbertson, Superintendent of the Presbyterian Chinese Mission of this city. Miss Culbertson was born in East Groveland, N. Y., and, coming out here some twenty years ago, began work in a Chinese Sunday-school. She was called from this occupation within a year to be the Matron of the Chinese Home, and later, in 1878, became its Superintendent. Miss Culbertson held this position nineteen years, in the face of threats against her life and in constant danger of personal violence, that might have deterred even a trained police officer from carrying out his duty.

The major part of Miss Culbertson's work consisted in getting the slave girls out of disreputable houses and sheltering them in the mission until they could be safely disposed of. She has in this way rescued over 500 girls, not one of whom has relapsed. It would have been an easy matter for Miss Culbertson to sit in her office and listen to reports and write out directions to the Chinatown squad or the Cruelty to Children Society, and there are even men a' plenty who would have done so. But this woman was different. She went right down into Chinatown herself, deep down into the filthiest tan rooms, with highbinders and hatchet men at her elbows, and often went there alone and in advance of the officers. She has had more than one narrow escape. To the day of her death she carried a knife scar, the work of a tan-man, who saw his property being taken from him, and, indeed, there are those who say that death was hastened by this wound. It was not a woman's work, but Margaret Culbertson carried it through to a successful issue, and at the time of her death it could be said that she was the one woman of the United States who had done the most in suppressing, or at least hindering, the trade in slave girls.

And the task was not always thankful. One would like to imagine a life-long devotion on the part of the rescued girls; a gratitude like that of a dumb creature, that when they came to die they spoke her name and called her blessed. Of course this has happened, but as often as not the girls did not even know they were being saved—believed, in fact, that they were to be horribly maltreated, screamed to be taken back to their friends, preferring the known miseries of their own tribe to the unknown doings of the white devil. Almost the last work of Miss Culbertson's mission involved the apprehension of nearly fifty slave girls on a newly arrived ship. These girls, believing that they were to be taken to the homes of their friends upon landing, fought like fiends with the police, who took them in charge, and once inside the mission filled the place with a clamor of wailing and screams quite beyond words. They spat and kicked and scratched like so many wild beasts, wouldn't so much as listen to the mission's interpreter, and were fully convinced that some dreadful evil was intended them. So we can imagine that Miss Culbertson had her trials and disappointments. She was one of the prominent figures of San Francisco, and it will be long before her place is filled. Some short time ago her health, which had been failing for five years, collapsed altogether, and she was obliged to leave her life-work unfinished and go to her home in the East. She arrived just in time to die.

The dress worn by the Queen on Jubilee Day was made of black moire, with a front and panels of the latest description of dove-colored silk, wrought all over with fine silver embroidery in a design of rose, shamrock and thistle. Her Majesty's cape was of black chiffon with many inserted designs of white lace and silver emoroidery, and her bonnet was richly wrought with jet and silver and trimmed with white acacia and white ostrich feathers. The Queen carried an untrimmed, unlined sunshade of pure white silk.

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

Dear Diary, since I have had aught to confide in your pages, and looking backward I am confronted with reproachful blank sheets. And now, what am I to tell you about? Of my summer days spent in the Santa Cruz mountains, largely drinking in the atmosphere laden with pine odors, becoming plump on a diet of real warm milk from the cow, as the children say, and fruit that would have tempted Paris to make a new division of the golden apple? It was an Adamless, and, consequently, a serpentless Eden, though I believe we did meet an occasional rattler who, however, avoided us, showing the wisdom of his progenitor. They were dear delicious days without thought of the morrow, of social sensations, without any of the thousand trifles that go to make up the troubles of even the happiest of debutantes.

I only returned last week, and since then have been busily engaged in the gentle art of decorating my small person and worrying mamma and the dressmaker into an early grave. I find little change—bicycling seems to preserve a measure of its early popularity with certain of the girls. Several make daily trips to the beach, among them Miss Voorhies, Miss Florence Ives and a number of the Presidio men. Lieutenant Haines is one of the most indefatigable of cyclists, and looks fascinating on his wheel. There are trips to Tamalpais in which the younger crowd participate, and there is still more than half of our own set in the country. Leila was at the Paper Chase on Saturday, and had a splendid time. It passed off without any accident to the daring maidens who rode. She says it is marvelous how the girls have improved during the summer months. They are much more plucky, and sit their horses with both ease and grace. We anticipate going to San Mateo this week, so I shall tell you about our doings there later.

On Wednesday we took in the Bohemian Club in the afternoon, and found all the world we knew and much of it that had not the pleasure of our acquaintance. We had an entertaining time. You see, there were numberless new cartoons and pictures of the last high jinks, and then it was like an immense afternoon tea without the worry of looking after hostess or guests. I have rarely seen such diversity of costumes—from the simplest of grass linen frock to the gayest grenadine, besprinkled with spangles and bedecked with lace. Many of the girls wore tailor-built frocks and sailor hats, while others were brilliant in scarlet hues in Dresden dresses of organdie or summer silk. I saw the Hagers, McNutts, Maud Younger, Mary Belle Gwin, and endless others of both younger, older and future sets.

I have not, thus far, heard of any matrimonial affairs as the result of the summer campaign. Of course, the Klondyke fever has upset certain of the youths and played havoc with Cupid's darts. I know of more than one promising coupling that has thus been hurled aside for the more exciting chase after fickle fortune. Yesterday I went over to Berkeley with Arthur and heard several bits of college gossip. Professor Gayley appears to be right "in it" at Oxford. He has been admitted to the Oxford Union it seems, and allows the impression to go abroad that it's a tremendous honor. Considering everything, the peculiar fact would have been had they not admitted him.

Then there is a new girls' society recently established; to speak more correctly, the old Kappa Kappa Gammas have reorganized. The first regular initiation of this august society took place last week. Two Eastern members came out for the occasion, and a particularly pretty pin was chosen. It always amuses me with regard to fraternities, clubs and organizations of all sorts, the wild and immediate desire for jewelry which possesses the members. They want an emblem almost before they have an establishment, and always prior to the adoption of rules, regulations, etc. Be it never so humble, a pin is the necessary adjunct to every society from the Colonial Dames to the graduates of a primary school. This particular ornament is a golden key set with such jewels as the individual taste or purse of the members may dictate, and bearing the letters "K. K. G." in the center. I wonder what this especial key signifies? Is it a key to wisdom or will it unlock the hearts of the professors and let the girls pass in at a side entrance? The new clubhouse is on the corner of Bancroft and Fulton streets, and the members anticipate much gaiety in the future. And now for another week, Diary, dear, farewell. Your own

MISS CRICKET.

The families of Oakland who have been busily pursuing pleasure during the summer months are grdually returning to their particular Lares and Penates. The Mhoons, Garbers, and McKees, who have been sojourning at Lake Tahoe, returned last week. Miss Ethel Moore is again at home after a most pleasurable trip to the Orient, and Dr. and Mrs. George Angus from a visit to the Geysers. The gayest colony of Oaklanders gathered at Castle Crags this season. Nearly all of the members of the Club of Twenty-One, which comprises some of the most bewitching of Oakland's maidens, were there. They spent the time giving amateur theatrical shows, concerts and riding and driving parties. Quite a little histrionic ability was discovered. Miss Ethel Kittredge showed marked talent, and was by common consent made leading lady in all the plays. Miss Mamie Barker made a chic French maid, and could have given points to the "Duchess" in "Chimmie Fadden." Miss Abbie Clift has a beautiful voice, and Miss Grace Govrill plays pleasingly upon the piano.

Oakland has simply been turned over to Hymen during the past week. Weddings of every variety, from the simple house ceremony with its accompanying formality, to the regulation church affair. From my point of view the most interesting marriage was that of Miss Mamie Nicholson and Mr. Paul Shipley. The ceremony took place in the bride's home, which was attractive in its decoration of branches of pepper trees and roses. The Rev. Floyd Mynard of St. John's Episcopal church officiated. Miss Nicholson is an interesting looking girl, with a distinctly pleasing personality. Mr. Shipley is well known in Oakland as a successful business man, and is interested in the firm of W. W. Pringle.

Of the other weddings their names can but be chronicled. Miss Mae Downing and Mr. Andrew Pickard, Miss Garrison of Alameda and Mr. Charles Holverson, Miss Abbott and Mr. Elmer Frost, Miss Nellie Wyckoff of Berkeley and Dr. Armisted of Boulder Creek, and Miss May Doyle and Mr. Edward Higby. The wedding of this week is to be the Moffitt-Folger nuptials. Miss Moffitt is an unusually attractive girl, possessed of an interesting and magnetic personality. Mr. Ernest Folger is engaged with his brother Atherton in the well known firm of J. A. Folger & Co. Outside of weddings, there have been but few revolutions of the social wheel. The monotony of life continues undisturbed, except for an occasional luncheon. Miss Ida Belle Palmer gave a pink lunch to Mrs. Harry Baldwin of Honolulu, who is here on her wedding trip. The decorations were pink carnations and smilax. Among those invited were Miss Ethel Moore, Miss Jesse Glascock, Miss Myhrah Prather, Miss Bernice Landers, Misses Alice and Lucy Moffitt and Miss Stubbs.

MUSIC

Grand Opera at the Tivoli — Emotional Vocalization.

That the public appreciate and demand operatic performances is sufficiently proven by the large and interested audiences gathering at the Tivoli. In fact, the popularity of opera seems to be growing everywhere in the country—opera seria that is. Whether the love of lyric drama induces a great musical culture or not, remains to be argued by those who feel themselves capable of settling the hash of all things terrestrial and subluinary. Modern opera has apparently two warm interests for the public, one for the story, the other for the singing. At present, judging by the exceeding tolerance granted to all sorts and conditions of singers the vocal interest is less than the dramatic, so much less that the quality of the singing counts for little providing it be forceful.

Strong sensations seem to be the pearls of price desired by the opera-goer, and consequently the music drama which can produce a continuous succession of thrills and chills is the medium most acceptable to audience and singers alike. Neither the public nor the singers ask of themselves any questions as to the realism of emotions expressed in song, for instance, "Aida," an Ethopian slave, finds it quite proper to shriek in set rhythm of the nineteenth century, accompanied by an orchestration almost up to date. The main business of opera or rather the music drama is to develop a whirlpool of emotions, mostly dramatic, consequently latter day singers emotionalize only.

Great reputations are nowadays built up upon the capacity of emotionalizing. All the singing is of the same pattern, and requires mainly immense physical vigor and recuperatice energy. Tamango and Materna are examples. An operatic career is under these conditions necessarily curtailed. Only the few endowed with exceptional physique can stand the literal wear and tear, especially the tearing of the voice.

The singers of the Tivoli are neither better nor worse than the average heard in opera anywhere. No real difference of vocal style between the singing of the French opera heard some months since and the Tivoli people exists. More dramatic vigor may have belonged to the French people and their prima donna had some advantages of youth and personality, but their costumes and scenery were miserable, whereas the Tivoli has been almost lavish in producing new costumes and scenery, effective and in excellent taste. Mr. Hinrichs has worked hard upon a mixum gatherum chorus, which promises to rise to the due occasion as the season advances.

Madame Kronold was probably meant by nature for something better than dramatic singing as understood to-day, but has settled down into the average dramatic soprano, and goes through her role with Germanic vigor and seriousness. Of course, there is vocal wear to be heard, but dramtic singing is all wear, all physical. Amneris gives a mezzo many chances, and Mrs. Fleming Hinrichs will, in time, become robust enough to fill out the role, but seeing that she has youth and temperament it is regrettable that these gifts should be cast into the maw of dramatic emotionalizing. Never has Mr. Mertens been as acceptable as now, for formerly his capacity to remain within the vicinity of the key was intermittent, whereas he now has the average intonation and has grown still more dramatic. What is left of the fine possibilities of Mr. Abramoff's voice is expended without stint. In general, "Aida" will gain with sufficient power and the ensemble is equal to the average performances in more ambitious opera-houses. Ponchielli's "Gioconda" promises to be especially interesting. The work is now here, and running over with dramatic fire. LESLIE MARTIN.

DRAMATIC NOTES

At the Columbia next week "The Idler," Haddon Chambers' successful play, succeeds "The Wife." It is in dramas of this character that the Frawley company appears to best advantage. The cast is quite as good as that of the Lyceum company, which first produced "The Idler" in San Francisco.

Johnny Carroll, the Irish comedian, will be the feature of the performance at the Orpheum next week. Another new-comer, and one of much merit, is Charmion, the Spanish ring artist. Gus Williams will have some new songs and jokes, and Professor Leonidas will continue with his cats and dogs. The holdovers include Mary Arniotes, Frencelli and Lewis, the three Rackett Brothers and Papinta—positively her last week.

Although "Turk Meets Greek" has not been as successful as "The First Born," it has been successful enough to receive considerable favorable attention, even if that attention is principally bestowed upon the settings of the stage. "Turk Meets Greek" will be continued until August 22d, after which there will be presented a number of Eastern successes, including "Too Much Johnson," "Girl I Left Behind Me," "Jane," and "The Highest Bidder."

The play at Morosco's next week will be "The Heart of Chicago," a drama of more than average interest. From a point of plot as well as of scenery the piece is unusually strong, portraying life in many different phases and situations in the great Western metropolis. Notable among the scenic features are the down-town districts of Chicago during the great fire, a night illumination in the Court of Honor at the World's Fair, the Masonic Temple roof garden, and a new railroad scene, unlike any other ever presented before.

After many months of waiting San Francisco is at last to have David Belasco's play, "The Heart of Maryland." It is to open at the Baldwin Monday evening. Aside from the play considerable interest has been aroused in Mrs. Leslie Carter, who has struggled through the tribulations and trials of the stage as well as of matrimony until she is now safely on the hills of fame. The production will be under the personal supervision of Mr. Belasco, and will be identical in every detail to that given in the East. Following "The Heart of Maryland" Mr. William H. Crane will have the Baldwin boards.

Francis Powers' New Play Not a Success.

In "The First Born" Mr. Powers made a play of human passion and drama. In "Turk Meets Greek" he tried to make a play of a psychological study. The drama of "The First Born" was handled with a touch that was genius. The psychological study in "Turk Meets Greek" was handled with a faltering uncertainty, caught at and dropped, brought out suddenly in climaxes of meteoric vividness, swamped in stretches of monotonous dialogue.

The figure of the Grand Duke Constantine is all of "Turk Meets Greek." He is the psychologic study. He is the play. Mr. Powers' idea of making a four-scene, descriptive, stage piece, in the progress of which a sensitive, idealistic, poetic, and ineffectual character should be unfolded, is as original as the sharp and bloody story of "The First Born." Only to show the development of character on the stage, especially that illusive kind of character that Mr. Powers has undertaken to figure forth, requires a different touch, a wider stage experience, and above all more time in the working with and elaborating of the scheme than Mr. Powers has yet achieved or been able to give.

The play is a disappointment to those who looked upon this young man as a rising star. It has none of the powerful and grasping forcefulness of its predecessor. It does not show the same stage knowledge and instinctive sense of dramatic unity and proportion. It gives one none of that electric enthusiasm that great work like "The First Born" must evoke from the most phlegmatic. From the second scene to the end it is full of amateurish faults. On ears that strained for a repetition of the rich, sonorous dialogue which gave "the Chinese play" its bizarre, Oriental tone, fell a series of long, sophomorical, pedantic conversations about Pericles or Miltiades and Leonidas and Thermopylae and the Spartans and all the rest of it. It had, too, a curious tendency toward preaching. There were moments when one felt sure the writer was using the stage figures to voice his own sentiments and his sentiments, though good, and what they should be, were long to hear and dry in the telling and what we knew before, and what all properly brought up people thought and felt.

And yet—and yet—under all its faults, under all its clumsy construction and rhetorical talk—it has the real thing in it. While it disappoints after the perfect completness of "The First Born," it does not disillusion. The same startling talent, the same original points of view, the same splendid but untrained imagination appear in it. And beyond these one feels the struggle of a mind which has tried to body forth in this play one of the silent tragedies of life.

In Constantine Mr. Powers saw a modern Hamlet. The Prince's life is a series of high but futile endeavors, of dreams that never became actions. He is a man of noble aims, of lofty hopes, of impossible ideals, with neither the force, nor the hardihood, nor the debasing knowledge of men, to carry them to success. He is the man that the mills of the gods grind exceeding small; the man who is destroyed by the world, or who flies from it. It was a great conception of character, and Mr. Powers failed to present it convincingly. His idea even was not plain. The story of Ayesha, which most people followed hopelessly as the raison d'etre of the piece, was only one of the threads of the whole. In the scene with Smolensky, which the audience rose to as the sort of "strong scene" they were accustomed to, the real point was not the emotional display, but the stronger light thrown on the weakness and strength of the Prince's character.

Had Mr. Powers succeeded in showing us Constantine as he saw him, had he made us realize the futile and desperate struggles of this sore and shrinking nature, he would have won a success as brilliant as that of "The First Born." But we do not clearly understand, and feel with the Prince, who, when the great moment of his life came, failed. Nine out of ten of the spectators left the theater feeling that they had seen a strange, rambling play with a good spectacular side. "The first act was good," the house assured itself, as it slowly crowded out and up the stairs. The first act, which as stage-craft, was the best in the piece, was merely a prelude, glowing with Oriental color, and had only a picturesque connection with the plot. The bazaar-lined street, the glimpse of mosque and minaret, the figures of Kurds and Armenians, street hawkers and priests, merely went to form the background for the solitary figure of the Prince, who was a failure.

The real play begins in Act II, in a suitable environment—the Acropolis by moonlight and far away the plain of Marathon. Here among the relics of the past, gazing out as Byron gazed to where "the mountains look on Marathon, and Marathon looks on the sea," Constantine dreams his dream of love and glory. He thinks of the great dead that held the pass at Thermopylae and the greate dead that raised the columns of the Acropolis, and his soul is filled with the splendor of his hopes. The conception of the scene could not have been more poetic; but in the execution the poetry was submerged under dry, didatic conversation as stiff as a depating club and as full of geographical or political matter as the telegraphic dispatches in the daily press.

The picturesque side of things redeemed much of the long-winded dialogue. For stage effectiveness, Mr. Powers has a Wagner-like quickness of sight and invention. His street hawkers with their melodious cries, his chanting story-teller and the bell-like, dominating call of the Muezzin, as he summons the faithful to prayer, were used with brilliant effectiveness. The chorus of women, with their flickering handful of fire, and their mystic chant to Apollo, were a tremendous strain on one's sense of realism, but from the spectacular point of view, they were singularly beautiful. The one figure with its outstretched arms and the glow of the fire shining through the thin draperies, while back of it the marble columns, and the moonlit landscape, looked vague and softly dark, was a picture to remember.

GERALDINE BONNER.

The good impression made by the Frawley company last season in "The Charity Ball" was strengthened by this week's performance. The possibilities of the piece in comedy as well as in dramatic interest have placed it among the first of society dramas. These possibilities are fully looked to by the Frawleys and well taken advantage of. It was a good thing for Blanche Bates to play Ann Cruger instead of Phyllis Lee. Ann is more suited to her temperament, very much more so, than was the unhappy Phyllis. Miss Bates has seldom looked or acted as well. Frank Worthing is again John Van Buren, and makes a good study of the fashionable clergyman. He looks and acts to the best advantage in the third act, which, by the way, is the great scene of the play, and the real test of the players. Miss Moretti as Phyllis Lee adds much to the effect of this act by some very good emotional work. Frederick Perry reappears in the cast, and renews a favorable impression as Dick Van Buren. Harry Corson Clarke is inimitable as the Judge, and Wilson Enos makes a clever character of the old organist.

The scenery's the thing at Morosco's this week to the exclusion of almost everything else. The play, Lincoln J. Carter's "The Tornado," amounts to little in plot or in construction, but this is more than counterbalanced by the stage settings and mechanical effects covering many things, from a tornado and a storm at sea to a Chicago pier and the dissecting-room in a medical college. The scenery is always good at Morosco's, but this week it is good out of the ordinary. The comedy people have the honors in "The Tornado," and they are four—Dutton Wansor, Leslie Morosco, Julia Blanc and Irma Fitch, who play their parts with spirit. By long odds Landers Stevens is the most able man in the company, and the most attractive as well. His work this week is only in the first and second acts, but it leaves an excellent impression.

In all cases of physical or mental exhaustion the use of a little Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey will be found invaluable as a stimulant.

IN NEW-BOOKLAND

An Unprejudiced Impression of the Late Works of Miss Corelli and Dr. Conan Doyle.

This is the season of inaction in the publishing world the period between summer and autumn in which compositors rust and editors go on vacation. The busy author, having finished his Christmas dole for the December magazines—for it is in August these important holiday publications are prepared for the press—hies himself and family to the seashore and discounts his celebrity at whatever rate of interest it may command. As for the reviewer—it devolves on him to deal with survivals—the books left over from other and richer days. Here, for instance, is Marie Corelli's "Ziska" (Stone & Kimball), and "Uncle Bernac" (D. Appleton & Co.), of which Conan Doyle has recently been delivered; "Symphonies (John Lane), by George Egerton, and the foolish parody on Le Gallienne's "Golden Girl"—the "Gilt-Edged Girl"—which I verily believe John Lane had written to head off Max Beerbohm or H. D. Traill, who could have performed the task to perfection. If ever a book lent itself to ridicule, surely it is the strange adventures of Richard in search of a spouse. The series of occurrences were all susceptible of the most exquisite misinterpretation—the over-flowery style might easily have been "guyed" out of court. Don't you remember the set of parodies Beerbohm did for the Christmas "Saturday Review"—in which he imitated H. J. Wells and George Meredith and this same Le Gallienne—with delightful humor. He had the latter describe in the pathetically poetic, rose nightingale moonlight style which he affects, the making of an applepie bed. There is nothing of the writer of "Prose Fancies" in the "Gilt-Edged Girl"—it is literary horse play—foolish fatuous stuff failing of rhyme, reason or fun. To realize what may be effected by a parody, one may recall the consequences of the "Green Carnation," in which Beardsleyism and the cult of the epigram were so cleverly derided. It was this book that terminated the career of Oscar Wilde and all his affectations long before he fell beneath the sword of justice.

But here, however, we have "Ziska," the latest effort of the strong-minded young woman who is said to be the Queen's favorite novelist. Her majesty has always displayed such excellent sense in governing her dominions that it seems impossible she should really approve of Marie Corelli. 'Tis..an the attitude of this pretty young woman to the critics and to the world there is really nothing more vulgar. She is continually heaping passionate abuse on the heads of the unfortunate gentlemen who cannot approve her wild-eyed tales—which in spite of this unflattering condemnation have an enormous sale. There is no reason why "Ziska" should be read. True, it passes idly an hour or more of idle time, but there are so many better books appearing every day. As a work of imagination it does not compare with "She," and it lacks all the other characteristics that make for literary distinction. If it had been penned by some one less prominent than Miss Corelli one would not think of giving it more than a three-line notice. "Ziska" is a ghost reincarnated to revenge a cruel wrong done a dancing girl of early Egypt by Araxes, a great warrior of the time. He won the love of this Ziska Charmian and then stabbed her, which was really very unkind. The soul of the warrior is on earth again disguised as Gervase, the greatest of French painters, and inevitably he falls in love with the lovely and mysterious young person who is creating such a furore in Cairo, Princess Ziska. He is quite an unprincipled but tremendously handsome fellow, and really his views on woman and marriage, and on the covenances generally, are, to put it mildly, Bohemian. However, Ziska enmeshes him firmly in the toils of her beauteous eyes and his fate is sealed—he is spirited away to the great pyramid and dies kissing her siren lips. The moral is, of course, don't have an ancestor who was in the habit of stabbing early Egyptian ballet girls. It may be confusing three or four thousand years later.

After "Sherlock Holmes" and the "Stark Munro Letters," "Uncle Bernac" strikes one as decidely unskillful. No one, not even Max Beerbohm, who has had several amusing tilts with the doctor, denies him a pretty talent at story-making. He can blend and develop a complication with the best of his predecessors, and really has few superiors in the gentle art of literary mystification. Besides, he has also the talent of limning bold character in such strong and broad lines so he stands forth in the mind a veritable man, if not a hero. Considering such endowments one has a right to demand of Conan Doyle a good story. He gives us "Uncle Bernac." For proper proportion there should be twice as much of this book as it now stands. It opens fairly, suggests romantic events to follow. We are shown the ingredients of a mysterious and interesting complication, and lo! Napoleon cometh upon the scene, and M. de Laval becomes an insignificant entity, whose function it is to describe the appearance, conversation and manner of the great man. The plot goes to pot at once. There is a twist to bring the curtain down—a disillusionment, a marriage, and that is all. It may be a vivid impression of Napoleon that is set forth, but one does not ask one's history precipitated in this manner. It certainly is not what it purports to be—a novel.

The "Symphonies" of George Egerton are so in name only. Really, like most of their predecessors, they are discords. The events related are all intensely tragic. Happiness concerns not this writer; she finds her theme in the misfortunes of individual women—their losses, failures, deceptions. The impression left upon the mind testifies to the ability and power of the author. You may deplore as you will the loose form of the narrative, but, unquestionably, the phrases ring true and cut to the quick. If only the situations were true also; not merely forms of fact distorted for the bearing of morals. What a ruthless responsibility is the burden of a message and how luriously it does affect the art of the victim. If George Egerton was not weighted down by her mission for the regeneration of the sex, surely she would breathe a little glow and fancy into her prose. Unrelieved gloom is as ineffective as shadow without light. Imagine the literary wealth of "Heart of the Apple" clustered round some subject of real life. It is a creation achieved for the benefit of the theory it promulgates—the hopelessness of woman and the general unworth of man. Just so, too, is "Pan" laden with the same dark burden. To my mind it is the best, most shapely, story in the volume, though "Oony" has passages that pulsate with passionate beauty.

These stories show the writer at her best. They have a value very distinct from such stuff as "Sea Pinks" and a "Nocturne. In the telling of these two tales there is a foolish masculine affectation—they are supposed to be told by a worldly and slangy young man who talks about his "diggings" (lodgings), and enters into a lengthy explanation about the tendency of women to button from right to left, whereas a man buttons from left to right—reflects in staccato sentences in a fatuous way. The situation reminds one a bit of "March Hares"—the narrator sees from his window over the embankment a woman gazing into the water of the river and takes her up to his "diggings." She is wet and faint from starvation, and He, this very masculine He, gives her tea and subsequently "baccy." But let them speak for themselves:

I took off her hat, a quiet, little black felt affair, positively soaked with rain. She had lovely hair, glossy yellow, not "brown at the roots" kind, you know; it had a crinkle in it, and the line down the middle of her head was white as an almond. I hate the type of blonde that has a pink skin to her scalp. I concluded she couldn't have been long in the streets, for the bit of white at her neck and the handkerchief in her lap were clean—a day's soil at most. She wore woolen gloves; I pulled them off; she opened her eyes, closed them again. She wore an old-fashioned thin wedding-ring on her right hand, perhaps her mother's; she had pretty, long hands; but hands don't attract me like feet or ears. I belong to the race of men to whom temptation comes in the guise of little feet. An instep or ankle appeals irresistibly to my senses; I acknowledge it frankly; it's damned odd, but I can't help it—the appeal, I mean. My friend Foote says, delicately perfumed lingerie is his weak spot; his fall is sure at a flutter of lace and ribbon. To be virtuous, he would have to live in a land where the drying of women's frillikins on a clothes-line would be prohibited by law. Her feet were not pretty, although her boots were decently cut. What an odd face she had; I can see it in white relief on the red of the leather. A bit like Christine Nilsson about the forehead, big clever nose, tremendous jaw—a devil or a saint, or I'm no judge. She opened her eyes at last. I held out the glass; she shuddered, pushed it away almost roughly, and said:

"No, please not that, I am afraid of it; I daren't touch it, it would be so easy to get to want it—when one is miserable."

"Quite right; suppose you have some tea instead."

She flushed and smiled; the saint was certainly uppermost just then.

"You are very good; yes. I should like some."

I am rather a dab at making tea. Lloyd gets me the best in the market; never get good tea in a woman's house—afraid of the price or something.

"You had better take off that wet jacket."

Odd woman that; she stood up at once—she was still shaking—and took it off, hanging it over an oak stool. She was a well set up woman, of the thoroughbred flat, spare English type; getting on for the age the lady novelists find interesting—thirty, perhaps. They may say what they like though, there is nothing like milk-fresh youth. By the Lord Harry, it's a beauty in itself! The plainest fresh-skinned wench with the dew of life in her eyes is worth ten of any beauty of thirty-five. Her dress was literally soaked, it hung heavily about her ankles; there were two wet patches, too, where her feet had rested. I dug the poker into the fire and said, without looking round:

"You'll be laid up to-morrow if you keep that skirt on; go into the other room and take it off; don't mind me, I've seen petticoats before now. Hang it to dry before the fire and put your boots in the fender. You'll see a collection of Eastern footwear—it's rather a fad of mine—on the wall, find a pair to fit and slip them on."

Didn't see her face, busy with the kettle. A moment's silence, then I heard the door shut softly. Admirable woman that! when I come to think of it, the only woman I ever met who could do a thing without arguing about it.

That this "Making of a School-Girl" (John Lane) is the best work of Evelyn Sharp cannot be urged as the excuse for its production among the Bodley Booklets. It is a very natural story of the loves and troubles of a little English girl, to whom we are introduced in her frocks and take leave of after a term in boarding-school. Much better work from the pen of Miss Sharp has appeared in "The Yellow Book." Indeed, there must be due soon a volume of her short stories, as well as one from Miss Ella D'Arcy, who is surely one of the cleverest short-story writers of the day. Apropos of "The Yellow Book" there were some excellent tales in the April number, especially one by Henry Harland, whose work gains in value and charm with each succeeding number of the publication he edits so admirably. Nothing could be more gracious, more dainty, more fascinating that the story of the beautiful Princess with the ruddy locks, who has been married by proxy to a King she has never seen. It has the distant delicacy of a fairy story, and is told with something of that exquisiteness which characterizes the stories of Frederic Wedmore.

BOOK NOTES

A late number of Appleton's "Town and Country Library" has Mrs. Campbell Praed's novel, "Nulma." It is a story of life in Australia, and is very much like Mrs. Campbell Praed's average story of life anywhere else. Nulma is a child of nature, of antipodean nature in particular, with a walk like a stag, hair the color of a ripe bunya nut, and big brown eyes with something of the shy fearlessness and liquid softness of a deer. From all this it will be seen that Nulma was beautiful. She has a somewhat stormy time falling in love with the wrong person—but finally falls tearfully out and becomes the wife of a man who has the attributes and the worldly goods thought essential in the make up of a desirable husband.

In view of the recent differences between Greece and Turkey a very timely book is "The King of the Mountains," by Edmond About (Rand, McNally & Co.), translated from the French by Mrs. C. A. Kingsbury. The King, by name, is Hadgi-Stavros, and by profession is a retired bandit, retired from the genial occupation of sacking towns and the like, but retaining the privilege of capturing and holding for ransom wealthy tourists who happen to intrude in his environment. The book is a French classic, rounding with "Tartarin of Tarascon" for its humor and ludicrous situations. Of course, the translation falls far short of the original, but the drollery of the situations is retained and one realizes the fame of the tale from the rendering of Mrs. Kingsbury.

Something of much benefit to San Francisco and to the State in general is the new guide book just published by William Doxey. It contains a complete and interesting description of the city and of its sights—special attention being given to Chinatown, to the customs and language of the people of that quarter. The principal cities and pleasure resorts of the State receive detailed attention, and the illustrations throughout are of a high order. Altogether the guide is reliable and interesting, the very thing for the tourist.

John Strange Winter has written already more than fifty books, but her pen still goes writing on with prospects of at least fifty more. One of these is "Into an Unknown World" (J. B. Lippincott Company). There are forty-six chapters in the book, each one headed with a bit of verse, and all through these forty-six chapters Mrs. Stannard's characters move more or less conventionally and say and do more or less conventional things. All of which happens frequently in most novels and nearly always in Mrs. Stannard's.

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever. Nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

OPINIONS OF LEANDER

Showing the Plausible Mistake of a Misguided Eastern Man.

Last nght I went over into the Latin Quarter to play "Bocce" with an Italian friend of mine who works in a cigarette factory and is perhaps an anarchist. "Bocce" is a kind of game that involves much rolling of little balls in dirt alleys underneath "wine-shops"—a sort of combination of tenpins and golf and marbles. It's fairish exercise, and vin ordinaire in tin pint measures tastes very good thereafter; also a dish of salad with just a suspicion of garlic, and a quarter of black bread rubbed with an onion. I went to the "Red House" for this wine and salad and bread, and who should I meet there—there of all places—but Leander.

"Heigho-ho," says he, with a great sigh as we settled ourselves to the hacked and blackened table. "This is a wicked world, Just." "Marry and to that," says I, rubbing onion on my black bread. "When did you find it out?"

"Twenty-three years seven months and ten days ago."

"You surprise me. What happened twenty-three years seven months and ten days ago, to brand that hateful truth upon your conscience?"

"I was born."

I had nothing more to say.

"And recent events," sighed Leander, "have but confirmed my theory."

"As for instance?"

"A man and a girl—"

"There's trouble coming."

"Big trouble; I 'most punched his head."

"There would have been worse trouble if you had."

"I know that, but noblesse oblige, you know."

"What did the man do to awaken your nobility?"

"Said things about the girl."

"Was she a nice girl?"

"Very—and he was a nice man, only—"

"Only what?"

"He misunderstood the girl."

"San Francisco man?"

"No; Eastern."

"San Francisco girl?"

"Yes—very much so."

"That's so, you said she was a nice girl. But if he was an Eastern man, why was his head to be punched, especially if he was nice?"

"Well, he didn't know how to gauge a California girl—this girl, anyhow—thought she was fast."

"Gracious! Did you enlighten him?"

"Tried to but failed."

"Explain."

"It was at the club."

"Yes; well?"

"I had given the Eastern man a two weeks' card. Some half dozen of us were sitting at the window watching the world go by."

"You mean you were watching for girls."

"Well, by and by this girl came along."

"And?"

"Well, she came by; we all saw her; of course, all of us knew her, but we didn't say anything, because—"

"Because why, Leander?"

"Well, there's a certain crowd of fellows in that club—we're pretty small, though—but somehow we don't believe in mentioning a girl's name indiscriminately amongst a lot of men."

"Hear! Hear!" said I, rapping on the table, "Leander, you must put me up there."

"Why, you're one of the directors."

"Oh, that club! Well, go on. Has the girl got by?"

"Not yet; we sat there looking at her and thinking what a pretty, stylish little girl—she's very young—she was, and how very jolly and companionable, when this Eastern man ups and out with:

" 'Hello, there's little so and so.' "

"I say, that was rough; what happened?"

"None of us said a word, and I began to talk about something else, but my Eastern man wouldn't down; says he: 'Jolly little piece, that.'

"Says, I, mighty stiff, 'I don't think the young lady is under discussion!' 'Well, let's discuss her,' says he; 'she's the gayest chicest, jolliest little girl I've met between the two oceans; you got lot's like that out here?' "

"Then what happened?"

"Well, then he rather saw that he'd put his foot in it, and he says, 'Well—pardon me—but—but she's fast, isn't she?' I say. Just, you ought to have seen that crowd. Every one of the fellows was just getting ready to say something very politely noble and crushing, and I was wondering if I hadn't better punch his head without saying anything, when my man says: 'I've every reason to think that I am right;' and do you know what his reasons were, Just'?"

"I think I do; shall I guess?"

"Go ahead."

"She was one of the kind of girls we spoke of once before—a little cigarette smoking, a little cocktail drinking, and perhaps the man had kissed her."

"Several times."

"And he had gauged her according to those things."

"He'd only known the Eastern girl, you see."

"I see. There are only two kinds of girl back there. The positively good and the positively bad, and he thought if this particular girl wasn't one she was the other."

"Exactly, and the worst of it is he will always be in doubt about her. He went away yesterday. He'd only seen the little girl a few times, and it never came to the point when she could show herself to be the good girl she really was. He never asked her to take supper with him, for instance, and so he's gone away with the impression that she's fast, and that we've got lots like that out here."

"It's rotten," said I, exasperated.

"And was he altogether to blame?" said Leander, as he rapped for the check.

The Joys of Living in Mill Valley — Its Views, Villas and Hostelries.

There are few prettier places around the bay in the vicinity of San Francisco than Mill Valley. It is only an hour's travel from the city, but it possesses, nevertheless, all the charms of real country life that dwellers in less favored cities than ours must voyage far to find. The rides and drives are excellent, the roads in good repair, and Tamalpais is an ever-present delight which the scenic railway brings close at hand. Fogs are unknown in the valley and low temperatures are unheard of; rains are remote and infrequent incidents. The air is like dry and sparkling Mumm; fishing is not impossible, and hotels are not wanting to furnish the sojourner with "all the comforts of home."

Indeed, one of these caravansaries is conducted upon quite metropolitan lines. "The Sanitarium" it is called, and E. Steel, proprietor, has even gone to the length of securing as his chef a clever artist who formerly presided in the Palace Hotel Grill-Room. The hotel derived its name from the mud baths hard by, and which are open to the use of the guests. It must not be supposed, however, that the place is merely a hospital for convalescents. Quite the contrary. The table, I am told, is most excellent, and the service, attendance, accomodations and so forth quite up to the standard set by the large institutions of Pacific Coast watering-places.

As has already been suggested, the Mount Tamalpais Scenic Railway has its terminus at Mill Valley, and one of the favorite amusements of the "summer people" is to take a run to the summit when the valley gets too warm. The trip can easily be made in a few hours, and the view on both sides from the top is in itself quite "worth the price of admission." For a long time the hotels of the place—the Mill Valley, the Blithedale, and the Sanitarium—were sufficient to take care of the migratory army of "summer people" who were seeking for a pretty place not too far from the city wherein to spend the season, but of late many of these visitors who have made the place their regular resort for several years past have become so charmed with the valley that they have erected there their country houses. Quite a considerable number of these have grown up of late in the forests of redwood that cover the canyon slopes, and very pretty they look, too, with their red roofs and quaint gables standing out in sharp relief against the green backgrounds of the woods. One of these newly built residences, and incidentally one of the largest, is that of Mr. E. L. Hueter of the Bass-Hueter Company, of San Francisco. Mr. Hueter has constructed his charming villa according to the style of the Swiss chalet, a very appropriate architecture for a hill country residence. It is a very comfortable house set in a delightful little park. The gables are many and pointed, and the roofs weighted down with rocks and boulders in true Alpine fashion. The main living-room is as charming an interior as can be found around the bay, spacious and roomy and most tastefully appointed. It may well be that since it was designed by Dobbertin, the artist and sculptor. Over the fireplace is a splendid figure of an eagle, very well executed and remarkably life-like. It is from this figure that the villa has taken its picturesque name of "Eagle Cliff." Mr. August Hinz is another gentleman who has built in the valley. His is a charming residence set in a grove or redwoods and surrounded by deep verandahs. From the upper windows the view is fairly panoramic, while a spur of the mountain rising immediately in its rear makes an admirable setting. Mr. Lovell White, too, has a pretty little villa not far off, likewise deeply verandahed, its roof being upheld by a row of arches which give the place its name. The country residences of Mrs. Howells and Mrs. Huber are of a less pretentious character than the others mentioned, but are none the less agreeable for all that. Mrs. Huber's home is on an elevation that commands a splendid sweep of valley and foothill, the view being shut off only by the mass of Tamalpais. Mrs. Howell's house is a picturesque little cottage surrounded by live oaks. These places are but a nucleus, no doubt, of a great number of villas and country seats that will, one of these days, rise from the hillsides of Mill Valley like the growth of a mushroom town so soon as the advantages of this delightful canyon are more widely known.

After a morning on the beach, a sail, a long ride on your wheel, or other exposure to the sun, nothing is so reviving as a sponge-bath perfumed with Murray & Lanman's Florida Water. By its use the sense of chill will be entirely removed and the bath rendered doubly enjoyable.

For more than a quarter of a century the famous old Jesse Moore "AA" whiskey has been the favorite with connoiseurs.

A GREAT ENTERPRISE

The Continental Building and Loan Association.

In the face of prevailing hard times and the long "winter of discontent" through which the finances of the country have been laboring of late, the showing made by the Continental Building and Loan Association of California during the past year is as extraordinary to the lay brother as it must be gratifying to the gentlemen directly concerned in the undertaking. The building association is a boon to the man of small salary who has a family and wants a little home to house it in. Instead of paying rent he may pay for his residence—built expressly for him—to the association, in monthly installments, and at the end of seven years be able to call the little house his castle. That the association is rapidly and steadily gaining in the public's favor is evident from the fact that for the year ending 1897 it helped 106 of its members to build homes for themselves against 80 for the corresponding period of 1896, and 54 in 1895. Taking five people as the number of the average family, it can be said that the association has practically built a little town of 530 inhabitants. Another point to be considered is that the building of these houses gives employment to a small army of carpenters, plumbers and mechanics. In fact, it can be affirmed that no other financial institution gives employment to so many working people.

In a way, investment in the association is as safe as in a well managed bank. In the first place it has one security that is the best in the world—real estate. The funds are loaned in small amounts on improved real estate, first mortgage, worth at least twice the amount of the risk, to say nothing of the usual fire insurance protection. The association does not discount paper, nor does it even take any kind of commercial risk. Moreover, it is protected against runs in times of panic by the law, which provides that not more than half its monthly income need be paid out for withdrawals. In the remote event of every shareholder attempting to withdraw at the same time there would be no sacrifice of securities or impairment of assets because under the law they could only withdraw as fast as the monthly receipts would warrant, so that the last member could retire from the association with equal privileges and equal profits with the first.

The best proof, however, as to the solidity and growth of the institution can be seen by reference to its books. A comparative summary of the last three years' business is consequently appended:

TURF TOPICS

So-Called Gentlemen Drivers—Winter Meeting Programmes.

The first installment of the grand trotting circuit was wound up on Saturday last at Oakland. The contests were good on the whole, and the public who attended were fairly well pleased with the sport, though no very striking performances were given. The only untoward event that the judges were called upon to deal with occurred in one of the races for non-professional drivers, where a change in the holders of the ribbons was found necessary to defeat some sharp practice not expected of drivers at any time, much less when classing themselves as "gentlemen."

As holders of the time-honored title of "Knights of the Sulky," professional drivers under any circumstances rank above mere "gentlemen drivers" in the turf scale of precedence, and after the incident alluded to their right to do so socially as well can hardly be questioned. It might be a good plan in the future to drop the "gentlemen" and use the term "non-professionals" to qualify sporting men—one cannot call them sportsmen—of this particular stripe; that is, if it be worth while to make a class for such people at all.

The scene has since changed to Marysville, where a meeting has been in progress this week.

The California Jockey Club has announced its first list of stake events for the fall and winter meeting at the Oakland track. It is the intention to have thirty-six stakes in all for the season, four more than last year, and the first list includes twenty events, for which entries will close on September 20th.

Although there are changes in detail, as compared with last year, the stakes to be given next season will be on the whole very much the same this coming season, with the increase in number above referred to. The fixing of the dates of certain events thus early will enable Eastern Stables to measure their chances better, and may perhaps induce some of them to reach the Coast earlier than in previous years.

The programme of the stakes decided upon by the Pacific Coast Jockey Club for the Ingleside meeting will be published very shortly, the total amount to be given away being about the same as last season. The first day of racing will be held at that track on Monday, November 1st, continuing for two weeks, when the scene will change to Oakland, and so on each alternate fortnight during the season.

Ornament has further added to his string of scalps this week by capturing the Detroit Derby, 1½ mile, in easy fashion. There were only four runners, the total value of the stakes being $8,065. This makes the fourth Derby Ornament has won this year, and from a racing point of view this last event was the least interesting. Meadowthorpe, who secured second place, was thought by his owner to have a chance, but at no time during the running did he succeed in reaching the winner, who held the lead throughout. Time, 2:36.

The Saratoga meeting—where, by the way, ladies get two free days a week—has produced some good 2-year-old racing, the most notable performance being that of Mr. J. E. Madden's Hamburg (Hanover—Lady Reel). In the Congress Hall Stakes, five furlongs, this good colt, ridden by Wilhite and carrying the crushing impost of 134 pounds, beat six other competitors of fair class, to whom he was conceding from 15 to 32 pounds, with comparative ease, in the good time of 1:01½. He was badly bumped several times in the course of the race. There is some talk of this youngster being taken to England next season, along with his stable companion, Howland. It would seem to be quite worth while to send him across the water, as a 2-year-old that can more than hold his own with such weight on his back is something altogether out of the common.

The "Spirit of the Times," giving an account of the Midsummer Handicap at Saratoga, in which the winner Sir Walter was ridden by Tarral, expresses the opinion that the game son of imp. Midlothian would have won many more races had he been in the hands of that jockey, instead of Doggett.

Mr. E. J. Baldwin's stable has been showing pretty fair form at Saratoga, his 2-year-olds San Antonio, La Maroma and La Goleta all running well.

Several of the horses now in the East that were racing here last winter seem to be all rounding into form, and more than holding their own.

The obituary notices of well-known turfmen and celebrated thoroughbred horses are becoming painfully frequent. Now we are advised of the death of Strathmore, the famous sire, at the McGrathiana Stud, Kentucky. Strathmore, foaled in 1876, was by Waverley, a son of imp. Australian the Great by West Australian, his dam Brenna by imp. Knight of St. George out of Levity. As a race horse he ranked high, and as a sire produced many reliable horses possessed of exceptional speed. On both sides of the house his pedigree abounded with the blood of Blacklock.

There is no prospect of a horse show being held in San Francisco this year. Just at this time there is nothing to be gained by setting out the various reasons why no show will take place, but it is only right to say that the Horse Show Association is not to blame. The organization still exists, with its capital practically intact, and would have been able and willing to renew the meetings of the past three years. That the function will be much missed by everybody does not admit of a doubt, and when one realizes how much good is done to breeders by shows everywhere else, it seems a pity that in a good horse country like California a high class show cannot be steadily maintained. Perhaps, however, when we have gone without a show for a year, fresh energy may be forthcoming to preserve the regular sequence of these events.

The generally improved condition of the market in Eastern and Middle States for useful horses is a matter for satisfaction, and it is to be hoped this state of things may be reflected on the Pacific Coast, where there is much less interest taken in raising high class horses than there used to be. These remarks do not, of course, apply to thoroughbreds, in which department California is well in the van. For all harness and saddle work horses of a good stamp are hard to find, and what breeding is being done here is far below the standard that ensures good results. The improvement in demand on the Atlantic side is in no small measure due to the considerable trade that is being done for export to Europe, the volume of which has been steadily increasing of late years. Buyers, however, will take only really good animals, and the common chance-bred stock raised on Western ranches is not looked at. If it be true, as reported, that the Secretary of Agriculture is about to stimulate such breeding work by visiting the West and drawing attention to the needs of Europe, more especially for military purposes, it is to be hoped he will leave with breeders a plain understanding of the requirements of the remount agents. In doing so he will enable ranch-owners to realize how far their horse-flesh productions at present fall short of what is requisite to attain a share of this trade, and also that if they desire to get into the export business in any way they must adopt very much better methods than those which now prevail on most of the big stock farms. To produce a good grade of serviceable horses for army work the use of thoroughbred stallions with bone and substance is essential, and the right stamp of mare only should be put to such sires.

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

The reasons why some men marry are often better than they are complimentary. An old Yorkshire collier, well known for his success in the coursing-field, recently surprised all his mates by marrying a very unprepossessing pauper-woman. He had always been reckoned a confirmed hater of the other sex. "Why has ta gone and got spliced, lad, at thy age?" one of his friends asked him. "Oh, that's not much of a tale," answered the old man stolidly. "I agree wi' ye 'at Betsy yonder is no beauty—if she had been I shouldn't have wed her. But that there dog o' mine he was simply pinin' for somebody to look after him while I was away at t' pit. I couldn't bear to leave him in the house by hissen, so I hit on the idea o' marryin' Betsy. She's not handsome, but she's mighty good company for the dog!"

Some few years back a young man fell deeply in love with a red-cheeked lass who worked in the same mill. But, though she was the subject of his nightly dreams and daily thoughts, he was o bashful that he could not, or dared not, offer her his hand. At last, driven to desperation, he put up the banns of marriage at the village church. On the following morning the unwooed bride-elect went to the young man and demanded an explanation. Thus cornered, he confessed the truth, adding: "If tha will not ha' me, I con gi' back-word." "Whod did ta pay?" asked the practical girl. "Four-an'-six-pence." "Well, tha corn'd get it back, and it's no use losin' four-an'-sixpence; but tha knows tha'll ha' to come a-coartin' all t' same." And he did.

Chauncey Depew attended the races at Newmarket during his recent visit to England, and was invited to a hunt breakfast. He sat next to a very swell woman, and this is the dialogue that ensued: "Under what colors do you race, Mr. Depew," inquired the Duchess. "I have quit starting, Your Grace," was the demure rejoinder. "But you always back your preference, I'll wager?" added the lady, archly. "In common with the American people, I have a grave respect for 'the dark horse,'" retorted the American, without turning a hair "Ah, yes; how remarkable!" replied the sporting Duchess in blank amazement. She then relapsed into a blue funk, from which she had not emerged at the last cable advices.

The dirt of the Afghans is proverbial. In the Afghan war Lord Roberts captured an especially filthy soldier and ordered that for the safety of the camp he be washed. Two genuine Tommy Atkinses were told off for this purpose. They stripped the prisoner, and scrubbed at him for two hours with formidable brushes and a large quantity of soft-soap. Then they threw down their brushes in disgust and went to their captain. "What is it, men?" "Well, sir," they replied somewhat excitedly, "we've washed that 'ere Afghan chap for two hours, but it warn't any good. After scrubbing him, sir, till our arms were like to break, blest if we didn't come upon another suit of clothes!"

A Southern bishop arranged to spend three days during his annual visitation at the home of one of the faithful, whose wife was a famous housekeeper. A negro boy was brought over from the plantation to be the bishop's body servant during his stay. The morning after his arrival, the bishop having failed to make his appearance, Jake was sent to summon him to breakfast, and found him shaving. In a few moments Jake returned, looking much alarmed. "Where is the bishop?" "He say he'll be dah directly." "What was he doing?" "A-sharpenin' ob his teef."

While stopping one night at a farmhouse in Missouri a traveler was astonished to see his hostess walk up to her husband about every fifteen minutes and box his ears or give his hair a pull. In the morning the guest, seeing the woman alone, asked an explanation of her strange conduct, and her reply was: "You see, stranger, me and the old man has been fightin' for ten years to see who shall boss this 'ere ranch, and I have jest got him cowed, but if I should let up on him for a day he would turn on me again, and my work would all go for nothin'."

The Bishop of London, Dr. Mandell Creighton, is a man of much wit. At one time when he was particularly active in raising funds for the restoration of Peterborough Cathedral, he was a guest in a country house credited with the possession of a ghost. His hostess somewhat unkindly put him in the haunted chamber. The next morning the Bishop was eagerly asked if he had seen the ghostly visitant. "Oh, yes," he answered, "but I asked him for a subscription to the restoration of Peterborough Cathedral, and he vanished immediately."

An old Scotchman, who had been a long time in the colonies, paid a visit to his "native glen," and, meeting an old schoolmate, they sat down to have a chat about old times and acquaintances. In the course of the conversation the stranger happened to ask about a certain Geordie McKay. "He's dead long ago," said his friend, "an' I'll never cease regrettin' him as long as I live." "Dear me! Had you such a respect for him as that?" "Na, na. It was na' on'y respec' I had for himself; but I married his widow."

Soon after Dr. Temple was appointed Bishop of London he was visited by a curate whose manners and services had not commended him to his ecclesiastical superiors, and who thought that his time had now come to make a decided push for a "living." "Well, my lord," said the curate, "now that it's raining livings, what are you going to give me?" "I can lend you an umbrella," said the Bishop, coolly.

THE PLIGHT OF MEXICO.

The silver in a dollar has shrunk to 42 cents in bullion value. Austria, Russia and Japan have successfully transferred their currencies to a gold standard; the mints of India continue to be resolutely closed against the further coinage of rupees, and there is no indication of any desire on the part of the British government to reopen them; China seems to have absorbed all the silver that even her vast empire can assimilate. Mexico remains unwillingly wedded to the silver standard, and as a consequence finds herself threatened with an overwhelming disaster. The obligations of the government are held abroad, and the principal and interest are payable in gold. As the value of silver sinks the government finds it more and more difficult, even with the augmented resources due to the wisdom and energy of the administration of Diaz, the greatest of Mexicans, to meet its foreign obligations. Exchange has risen to the point at which $240 Mexican dollars are required to meet an obligation of $100 in a foreign market, and merchants everywhere throughout the republic have been obliged to raise the price to the consumer of all imported products. It is noticeable also that the wages of the Mexican workingman have not yet been increased correspondingly or at all. Every evil with which we were threatened in the event of the success of the Bryanite heresies last year seems to have overtaken our neighbor republic, through its adherence to the silver standard. Yet the Mexicans were not guilty of any such colossal folly as that which Mr. Bryan and those who stood with him on the Chicago platform urged us to commit. They have merely adhered to a standard of values to which they have always been accustomed, the depreciation of which by natural causes alone has reduced them to a condition for which their statesmen, as yet, can find no relief. Undoubtedly the Mexican leaders would gladly abandon silver for the more stable standard of gold if they had at hand the means of effecting the change. But their country is poor, they are dependent on imports for many things which their own industries do not produce, and their obligations abroad must be met in gold. Their only alternatives now seem to be partial repudiation or entire isolation in the commercial world. Everybody who has observed the progress of the Mexican people during the last twenty years will earnestly hope that some way of escape from the calamities which seem to be impending may be opened to them. We do not need the example of Mexican disaster to add to the spectacle of our own renewed prosperity to confirm our fellow citizens in the belief that Mr. Bryan and his noisy cohorts are preachers of falsehood and delusion.

AMERICAN TARIFFS AND CANADIAN ROYALTIES.

There is a prospect of something like a bitter tariff war between our country and the Dominion of Canada. The Conference Committee of the House and Senate injected into the Dingley Tariff Act, at the eleventh hour, a provision, which, in effect, imposes a discriminating duty of 10 per cent. ad valorem, in addition to the duties imposed by the schedule, on all imports coming into the United States through Canada from other foreign countries. The Attorney-General has given his opinion that the provision is valid, and that the duty must be collected. When it is recalled that vast quantities of tea, silk and other imports from China and Japan have heretofore been landed at Vancouver and transported thence by the Canadian Pacific road to New England, New York and other Eastern Markets, all of which must now pay duty to the extent of an additional 10 per cent. on the value of the imports, or be landed at an American port and carried to their destination over American railroads, the importance of the provision will be evident. If, in addition to this, the privilege of transporting goods in bond, heretofore conceded to the Canadian carriers, be withdrawn, the great transcontinental road for which the Canadians have so courageously taxed themselves into poverty may become a bankrupt.

So far as San Francisco is concerned, we shall have no cause to regret that a greater portion than we have hitherto enjoyed of the trans-Pacific traffic will probably come to our port under the new regulation. But there are many of our citizens who would take no interest in the subject otherwise who will be glad to see the discriminating duties collected, regarding them as a just, if unintentional, retribution on the Canadians for the narrow and selfish policy which they seem inclined to pursue in regard to the development of the gold deposits of the Klondike. The proposition to retain for the Dominion government every other claim wherever gold shall be found, and, further, to exact a royalty of 10 or 20 per cent. on the output of such claims as may be developed by the energy and enterprise of the owners, is generally believed to be due to the consideration that almost all of the claims are in the hands of American citizens, and the produce of the diggings comes to the American mints. The industry of mining is too precarious in its returns to be subjected to such burdens. To a reasonable tax, such as would pay the cost of surveying and recording the claims and policing the country, there can be no objection, but any endeavor to make the government a sharer in the profits of mining because of its underlying ownership of the soil is bound to have consequences in attempts at reprisal, and may result in something more disastrous than a discriminating duty.

THE ANNEXATION OF HAWAII

Fallacious Reasoning of Senator White in His "Forum" Article.

Many pages of the August number of the "Forum" are taken up by Senator White in an effort to show cause why the Hawaiian Islands should not become a part of the territory of the United States. If it was his purpose merely to give publicity to the reasons on which he relies to justify himself for the stand which he has taken on this question, in opposition to the almost unanimous desire of the citizens of the State which he represents, the Senator himself may possibly be well satisfied with the result of his effort; but if he hoped that his arguments would convert the supporters of annexation, or would even bring to his side the doubting and the indifferent, he has courted a disappointment unless he has in reserve other and better reasons for his attitude than are set forth in his article in the "Forum."

The Senator's article, briefly summed up, asserts that the annexation of the islands is not desirable and cannot be justified on moral, commercial or military grounds. He calls the existing Hawaiian government a "bogus republic," declares that it exists in defiance of the wishes of a great majority of the inhabitants of the islands, and concludes that such a government has no right to dispose of its territory by treaty or to transfer the allegiance of its citizens. On the question of fact raised by such a statement the Senator offers no evidence. The Hawaiian government has maintained itself and cared for the Hawaiian people for four years without opposition beyond a feeble revolt by a handful of monarchists out of employment. It succeeded a corrupt, fickle, and incompetent queen, a burlesque monarch whose continued rule would have imperiled every good end for which civilized governments are maintained. It is the only respectable government that the islands have ever enjoyed, and it has received the support of a great majority of the active and intelligent islanders, native and alien, and the acquiescence of the multitude of the ignorant and indifferent. The competency of such a government to bind its people by treaty cannot be seriously questioned.

The Senator declares his further conviction that we shall derive no commercial advantages from the annexation of the islands because the natural interests of the islanders will always compel them to trade with us on better terms than they can obtain elsewhere. This argument would have more weight if the Senator had shown that the natural interests of a trading community always determined the direction and character of its trade. He is a member of a Congress which has just enacted a tariff bill in which the "natural interests" of some sections of our own country have been made to give way to what is believed to be the superior interest of the whole country. It is, for instance, to the natural interest of San Francisco to get cheap coal from British Columbia, yet we are required to pay a heavy duty on our fuel because the collective wisdom of our national legislature has deemed it to the advantage of the whole country to substitute artificial regulation for natural interest in determining our trade relations. We are aware that Senator White disagrees with the majority of his colleagues in Congress as to the wisdom of such a course, but his dissent has no bearing on the subject he discusses. The policy of legislative interference with the natural course of trade is established. We have adopted it ourselves and, with a single exception, all the great trading nations of the world have followed the same course. Even Great Britain, the exception referred to, has taken the first step in the direction of discriminating legislation in favor of her own colonial trade. The earth-hunger of the European peoples is still keen, and will never be satisfied so long as there are desirable spots of territory open to acquisition by treaty or easy conquest. If we take Senator White's advice and repudiate the tender of the islands made by the Hawaiian government, how long does the Senator suppose it will be before the islands will fall into the eager hands of England, Germany, France or Japan? And how long would it be, after such a fate had befallen them, before the natural interests of Hawaiian trade would disappear before the restrictions placed on it by a power hostile to American interests, in pursuance of a policy which we ourselves preach and practice? If we desire to retain our present control of Hawaiian commerce we must guard ourselves from hostile interference by a protectorate or by annexation, and every argument advanced by the Senator against the morality and expediency of annexation is just as valid, if valid at all, against a protectorate.

But it is when he comes to discuss the question of the military necessity of an occupation of the islands that Mr. White shows how far even a learned and able Senator can go astray in a field with which he is not familiar. He seems to be laboring under an impression that any position which requires defense is necessarily an element of weakness in war. He seems to take it for granted that any expansion of our territory means an increased danger from attack without any increase in our defensive power. If he had been a Senator when Jefferson effected the purchase of Louisiana he would probably have denounced the acquisition of territory west of the Mississippi river under the delusion that the possession of both banks of that stream would make it twice as difficult to defend it as it would be if we had contented ourselves with the possession of one side only. He seems to think that the advocates of annexation regard the possession of Honolulu as something which would contribute in some way to relieve San Francisco from peril in the event of a naval war, and he thinks that we shall have to strengthen our navy for the defense of the islands and expend a hundred millions a year for defense if we "go into the foreign acquisition business." In all this the Senator has completely inverted the military question involved in the proposed annexation. However strongly it may be fortified, Honolulu cannot contribute to defend San Francisco, or any other port on this coast, from the attack of a hostile fleet, but it can exercise a powerful influence in preventing such an attack. As a strong naval base in the rear or on the flank of a maritime enemy's line of approach, it could not wisely be disregarded by such an enemy. And nobody but an uninstructed legislator would contemplate a reliance on the navy for the defense of the islands. It is rather as a defense for the navy and as a means of multiplying the efficiency of our naval force in the Pacific that the islands have a military value. The cost of a single battle-ship expended in fortification and armament at the proper points in the islands would furnish a cover for a base of naval operations in the whole Pacific behind which our fighting ships and cruisers could coal and repair in safety, and the expense of maintaining a garrison for the defense of such a stronghold would not much exceed the cost of maintaining a single battle-ship in commission. In return for this every ship of war which we maintain in the Pacific would render us twice as much service as would be possible if it were necessary to come to San Francisco whenever the necessity of re-coaling and re-fitting required the ship to leave the station. It is economical to have a naval base as near as possible to the scene of naval warfare, and the acquisition of Hawaii would be an economical investment on much harder terms than those on which it is offered to us. And it must always be remembered that the possession of the islands would be even more advantageous to our possible enemies for purposes of aggression than to ourselves. Even if they were sure to prove to be a burden of which we would gladly be relieved, we must nevertheless assume the load lest, falling into other hands, they become a weapon against which we shall be found without adequate defense.

The Senator brings forward many old and often refuted arguments in support of his contention. He finds the islands to be too remote to be annexed, but remoteness and proximity are measured now in time, not in miles on the map. Thirty years ago California was more remote from the center of our population than the Hawaiian Islands are from San Francisco to-day. If there is any weight in this argument to-day it was far more weighty fifty years ago when California was annexed—a proceeding to which Senator White, as our first "native son" Senator, probably does not object. He urges that the islands are not "contiguous" to our territory. Well, Alaska is not contiguous, but we have found it to be of considerable value and we would hardly consent to part with it without consideration. Lack of contiguity would probably not move Great Britain or Japan or any other of our commercial rivals to reject the islands if offered to them on any terms. Contiguity is of no relevance anyway. We are less separated from the islands by two thousand miles of ocean than we would be by an equal stretch of land.

But the Senator says that we are not going to engage in war, and, presumably, there is no occasion for considering the military value of Hawaii. This amounts merely to a confession of faith that something like the millennium has already arrived. The interests of Great Britain are, he says, too vast to permit her to encounter the perils of a conflict with us, and Japan is too busily engaged in developing her manufacturing and trading interests to think of war. But the interests of Great Britain have been built up by war and are secured now by an ever existing readiness to go to war to protect or to extend them. As her interests have increased her armaments have increased in equal or even greater measure. Japan is not too busy in promoting her industrial and maritime interests to neglect the care of her army and navy, with a wise view to the protection of what she has and, possibly, to the acquisition of more. If we are to accept the belief of Senator White, we shall merely invite aggression and court humiliation by our stupid indifference to danger as much as we could by the most pusillanimous submission. We can safely rely on it that Great Britain, or Germany, or Japan, will cheerfully attack us whenever the gains of such a venture are sufficiently promising, and our condition of helplessness is sufficiently certain. We are treated in the Senator's article to the assurance that in the possession of Pearl Harbor we have all that can be desired in the shape of a naval station in the islands, that Great Britain has in her naval station at Esquimalt all that she can desire in the North Pacific, and that as our notice to the world that we shall not permit foreign intervention in the affairs of Hawaii has heretofore proved effective we can continue to rely on its effectiveness in the future. As to Pearl Harbor, it is idle to suppose that it will be of any value to us without the possession of the islands as a whole. No local government, without our guaranty, can assure us of the continued possession of that port or of the right to its use as a naval base. Similarly our notice of non-intervention signifies nothing unless we are prepared to enforce it, and that we cannot do without occupying the islands. The Senator seems to be perfectly willing that we should enojy all the advantages of annexation without assuming the responsibility, but this we cannot do. If we occupy Pearl Harbor for military purposes and proclaim to the world that we shall not permit any other power to interfere with the islands it will amount to annexation, and we must assume the responsibility for it. As for Esquimault, we have little to fear from a naval station that is so close to our borders. Great Britain would probably be glad to agree to demolish the "magnificent fortifications" near Victoria if she were permitted to replace them in her military scheme by a fortified station at Honolulu.

It should not be forgotten that the United States are not bound by the Declaration of Paris, the subscribers to which undertook to abolish privateering and to respect neutral goods under a hostile flag, as well as an enemy's goods under a neutral flag, except in the case of contraband war. It is true that our government refused to subscribe to this declaration because the subscribing governments refused to go so far as to declare all private property exempt from capture at sea, as it is on land. The result is to leave us at liberty to assail the commerce of our enemies on the high seas as we did in the last war with Great Britain, and as the Alabama assailed the vessels of the North during the civil war. It is not probable that privateering as a means of war will ever be extensively revived, but with a few fast cruisers we could do enormous damage to an enemy possessed of any commerce, whether his goods were borne in neutral or hostile bottoms. The value of such cruisers is entirely dependent on their ability to refit and recoal after a cruise, and this depends on the accessibility of a naval base. It is such a base that the Hawaiian Islands afford in the North Pacific. With those islands in our possession and securely fortified, one cruiser could do the work which three could not do without them. In the hands of an enemy they would be equally valuable to him, for defense or aggression. It is this consideration, disregarding all others, which makes it not only desirable but necessary for us to acquire the islands, however disagreeable the acquisition may be as regarded from another point of view.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

Ideas, it is said, are often as contagious as diseases. Therefore it is not extraordinary that it should occur to Engineer Newberry, who presides over the mechanical problems of the Sutro Baths, to tunnel Chilcoot pass. The tremendous climb of which the papers are full is a sharp ascent of one thousand feet, which, being steep, is also narrow and a fit subject for tunneling. Imagine all the trouble that would be saved—why, the world might go to the Klondyke much as it goes to Coffee Creek. Of course, Mr. Newberry does not suggest that his scheme would be as profitable as the Comstock tunnel of his employer, but he believes a vast income might be obtained from tolls. The original Sutro tunnel was devised to drain the mines. It drained the money of the investors—friends of the projector—from their pocket into his. The miners are to be drained this time, though I am sure they will be left money enough to go home on.

Nowadays one ought to be a millionaire to properly conduct a newspaper. Like yachts, journals have become luxuries. We have here Mr. De Young, Mr. Hearst, and now Mr. Spreckels, for breakfast every morning. In New York the news is administered by Mr. James Gordon Bennett, Mr. Pulitzer, Mr. Dana, who has several associate millionaires, Mr. Hearst and Mr. Whitelaw Reid, who are all capitalists. In London the Rothschilds, the Oppenheims and sundry other bankers make public opinion each day, and something similar happens in Paris. In Chicago the banks own the papers—indeed, throughout the world the day has gone by when the independent journalist whose brains are his only capital has the say-so in directing the policy or the interests of a great paper. The truth is a great modern journal costs as much to develop as a gold mine and is vastly more expensive to maintain. The great broadsides of news one has with one's coffee cost thousands per issue to produce. They command the services of a body of trained men—editors, writers, artists, printers, financiers, engineers and solicitors. Each day there must be employed a great deal of energy, force and foresight to obtain the best material and put it into shape. The problem is a tremendous one, and I don't envy Mr. Spreckels and Mr. Leake the task they have set for themselves. However kindly one may feel towards Mr. Shortridge, it must be confessed he failed to make a great paper of the "Call"—failed because he did not surround himself with competent and energetic men whose individuality and intelligence would have guided the enterprise to success. Mere business talent will not make a paper any more than literary ability will. It requires character, sagacity and a certain brutal force. Combine these, and you have the elements of success. Mr. Sam Leake does not pretend to be a newspaperman any more than Mr. John D. Spreckels, the new proprietor of the "Call," does, but he has a shrewd, resourceful mind and a quiet and powerful manner, indices of that intelligent capacity which, be it directed at novel writing, picture painting or mine management, inevitably achieves a measure of success. He certainly brings to his task a rare experience of men and affairs, for he has been prominent and powerful in politics, in Sacramento, and has managed cleverly the Ingleside Track for Mr. Adolph Spreckels. The "Call" will never make political mistakes while he is in control, and I think will generally be found on the winning side on election day. I am told that Mr. Spreckels, in assuming the responsibility for the paper, intends to be proprietor in earnest. He has begun to familiarize himself with his acquisition, and has spent a portion of each day recently in the office, examining into its affairs at the editorial as well as the business end of the "Call." The change means one thing—that the paper will have the tall building as its home.

Those who know about "Lucky" Baldwin's affairs were much amused at reading in the "Bulletin" of his great wealth. The article originally appeared in the New York "World," and was in the form of a letter to the editor—possibly at advertising rates. "Lucky" makes himself out a combination of hero and millionaire, but unfortunately has gone to his imagination for the facts, rather than to his book. It is true, he does own immense properties throughout California, but few of them are self-supporting, and he is mortgaged to the tune of two millions, the interest on which must amount to at least one hundred and fifty thousand a year; that is, it would if he ever paid interest or anything else, if he can avoid it. It is said that bill paying is really a mother of habit. There are certain lawyers and capitalists in San Francisco from whom it is well nigh impossible to collect a bill, but from "Lucky" Baldwin collection is achieved only by suit or foreclosure. It is his habit never to settle anything he can avoid. The Santa Anita ranch, quite the most magnificent property in Southern California, should produce him an income of at least a hundred thousand a year, but instead its maintenance costs him money; his horses are a source of expense. The Tahoe property, of which he boasts so proudly, brings in no rents commensurate with its value. As a hotel the Baldwin is a failure, although the property must bring in a big rental income from its Market street frontage. Baldwin will never sell land except under foreclosure. As for his other wild tales, the man's own character is sufficient refutation of his heroism. His whole story was a veritable "Arabian Nights" tale from beginning to end, though possibly "Lucky" himself may believe it.

General Barnes tells with amusing detail a story of his encounter with two well-dressed young gentlemen of very sober mien and capitalistic air, who accosted him at the City Hall recently just as he was entering to try the Figel case. "This is General Barnes," said the elder of the two, who wore a high silk hat and had a grave and composed manner. "We would like a moment of your valuable time on a matter of important business. We have been at your office and were directed here." "Not now, gentlemen," replied the General in his most courteous tones. "I am about to begin a trial." "But our business will not wait," said the spokesman; "can you not appoint a meeting for this afternoon? If not, we will be compelled to go elsewhere." "It might be a big case," the General thought; so he paused and replied, "I will meet you at my office at half-past four." At four-fifteen the General obtained an adjournment of the Figel case, on plea of a momentous engagement, and hastily took a car to his office. The prospective clients had not arrived, but word was left to admit them instanter. They came, and were ushered in, were given comfortable armchairs, and the spokesman launched into the business. "General," he said, "we want your photograph for the 'Voice of Progress.' This is a journal with a large circulation in the interior. It will cost you but thirty dollars; you may write your own biography, and it will show the people of California that you are still alive." This was all said with an air of kindliness and condescension, as though the favor were entirely on the side of the speaker. The General looked at him. "May I ask," he said, "if this was the important business for which you had me adjourn the Figel case?" "Yes, sir," said the spokesman; "it is an opportunity you cannot afford to lose." The General arose in his wrath. "Both of you had better get out," he said, "before I give you physical evidence of the fact that I am still alive."

"The San Francisco Commission Company" is the name of the latest bucket-shop. It is a cleverly devised gambling scheme organized to beat the municipal pool-room regulations, and from all appearances the system defies the ordinance. The commission company has behind it Christopher Buckley, William Harrison and their friends. It has all the plate-glass and oak fixtures of a bank, and a direct wire connects it with Chicago and New York. To enter you might suppose yourself in a national bank with produce exchange attachments, for all stocks, bonds, wheat, rye and other products are listed according to the proper conventionalities on huge blackboards. You can buy whatever you want, but it is not on regular lines that the firm does business. For purposes of its traffic there has been organized by an allied trust company in New Jersey a set of mining and other corporations, such as the Orizaba, Calaveras Mining and Milling Company, carefully incorporated in New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania. The actual stock of these various concerns is in the safe at the commission company's office, and business is done on them. The process is quite elaborate—the stocks are dealt with on margin and fluctuate on the strength of ostensible orders from New York. For instance, one dollar will buy on margin ten shares of Orizaba. If Orizaba advances the profit goes to the individual, less twenty-five per cent. commission to the concern. If the shares drop the margin disappears and goes to the profit of the company. In this way the concern wins at both ends. This is an adroit method of dollar getting, and will prove another bait to lure office boys and gullible investors to their ruin.

The Figel suit drags wearily along and promises to be as protracted as the Fair case. To judge from present impressions I am inclined to think no verdict can possibly be obtained from the forgery charge, and there seems to be no possibility of proving that it was Figel who killed Hoffman. The embezzlement case is another matter, however, and I should not be surprised if he were held on that.

Claus Spreckels has at last been persuaded into mining. The seductions of that pursuit he has long resisted, but now he is deeply into the Grizzly mine, and it will mean much if his first experience proves successful. The Grizzly was one of the rich mines of early days and yielded many thousands a month. But the early-day miners did not realize how deep down the California ledges extended, and this mine, like others, was abandoned when it had been excavated about six hundred feet. Then water rushed in and the appliances of those days were insufficient to cope with the rush. Mr. Sharswood has a contract for the Grizzly's development, and the shaft is being cut with extraordinary expedition, showing enroute the best kind of indications. Should this experiment strike a rich lead Mr. Spreckels will undoubtedly become as important a factor in the mining development of California as he has been in other industries.

The fire in the Utica was really a misfortune. For months past the main force has been engaged in development, and though the yield last year was eighteen hundred thousand dollars, the mine was not put to its full capacity. Preparations had all been made for a big clean-up when the conflagration occurred, and we would again be hearing stories of big proceeds but for the flames. The Utica is to-day the largest gold mine in the world, but even its owners are not provided with photographs of their enterprise.

Apropos of mining, I am told the Kennedy and Argonaut, which adjoin, were recently offered to a British syndicate for two and a half millions. The latest news from the Santa Rosalie mine shows the immense wealth of that originally much-decried investment. It is amusing to remember how Congressman Maguire denounced Superintendent Daggett for persuading the Mint employees to invest in the property. Some twenty-nine tons of ore came to town recently and yielded twenty-nine thousand dollars—which is not so bad. In exploring the property recently the Superintendent came across two new chutes which, if surface indications may be accepted, will make the Santa Rosalie one of the great gold producers of the world and enhance its value millions of dollars.

The House With the Blinds

By FRANK NORRIS

It is a thing said and signed and implicitly believed in by the discerning few that this San Francisco of ours is a place wherein Things can happen. There are some cities like this—cities that have come to be picturesque—that offer opportunities in the matter of background and local color, and are full of stories and dramas and novels, written and unwritten. There seems to be no adequate explanation for this state of things, but you can't go about the streets anywhere within a mile radius of Lotta's fountain without realizing the peculiarity, just as you would realize the hopelessness of making anything out of Chicago, fancy a novel about Chicago! or Buffalo, let us say, or Nashville, Tennessee. There are just three big cities in the United States that are "story cities"—New York, of course, New Orleans, and best of the lot, San Francisco.

Here, if you put yourself in the way of it, you shall see life uncloaked and bare of convention — the raw, naked thing, that perplexes and fascinates—life that involves death of the sudden and swift variety, the jar and shock of unleashed passions, the friction of men foregathered from every ocean, and you may touch upon the edge of mysteries for which there is no explanation—little eddies on the surface of unsounded depths, sudden outflashings of the inexplicable—troublesome, disquieting, and a little fearful.

About this "House With the Blinds" now.

If you go far enough afield, with your face towards Telegraph Hill, beyond Chinatown, beyond the Barbary Coast, beyond the Mexican quarter and Luna's restaurant, beyond even the tamale factory and the Red House, you will come at length to a park in a strange, unfamiliar, unfrequented quarter. You will know the place by reason of a granite stone set up there by the Geodetic surveyors, for some longitudinal purposes of their own, and by an enormous flagstaff erected in the center. Stockton street flanks it on one side and Powell on the other. It is an Italian quarter as much as anything else, and the Societa Alleanza holds dances in a big white hall hard by. The Russian Church, with its minarets (that look for all the world like inverted baloons) overlook it on one side, and at the end of certain seaward streets you may see the masts and spars of wheat ships and the Asiatic steamers. The park lies in a valley between Russian and Telegraph Hills, and in August and early September the trades come flogging up from the bay, overwhelming one with sudden, bulging gusts that strike downward, blanket-wise and bewildering. There are certain residences here where, I am sure, sea-captains and sailing-masters live, and on one corner is an ancient house with windows opening door-fashion upon a deep veranda, that was used as a custom office in Mexican times.

I have a very good friend who is a sailing-master aboard the "Mary Baker," a full-rigged wheat ship, a Cape Horner, and the most beautiful thing I ever remember to have seen. Occasionally I am invited to make a voyage with him as supercargo, an invitation which you may be sure I accept. Such an invitation came to me one day some four or five years ago, and I made the trip with him to Calcutta and return.

The day before the "Mary Baker" cast off I had been aboard (she was lying in the stream off Meiggs wharf) attending to the stowing of my baggage and the appointment of my stateroom. The yawl put me ashore at three in the afternoon, and I started home via the park I have been speaking about. On my way across the park I stopped in front of that fool Geodetic stone, wondering what it might be. And while I stood there puzzling about it, a nurse-maid came up and spoke to me.

The story of "The House With the Blinds" begins here.

The nurse-maid was most dreadfully drunk, her bonnet was awry, her face red and swollen, and one eye was blackened. She was not at all pleasant. In the baby carriage, which she dragged behind her, an overgrown infant yelled like a sabbath of witches.

"Look here," says she; "you're a gemmleman, and I wantcher sh'd help me outen a fix. I'm in a fix, s'wat I am—a dam bad fix."

I got that fool stone between myself and this object, and listened to it pouring out an incoherent tirade against some man who had done it dirt, b'Gawd, and with whom it was incumbent I should fight, and she was in a fix, s'what she was, and could I, who was evidently a perfick gemmleman, oblige her with four bits? All this while the baby yelled till my ears sang again. Well, I gave her four bits to be rid of her, but she stuck to me yet the closer, and confided to me that she lived in that house over yonder, she did — the house with the blinds, and was nurse-maid there, so she was, b'Gawd. But at last I got away and fled in the direction of Stockton street. As I was going along, however, I reflected that the shrieking infant was somebody's child, and no doubt popular in the house with the blinds. The parents ought to know that it's nurse got drunk and into fixes. It was a duty—a dirty duty—for me to inform upon her.

Much as I loathed to do so, I turned towards the house with the blinds. It stood hard by the Russian Church, a huge white-painted affair, all the windows closely shuttered and a bit of stained glass in the front door — quite the most pretentious house in the row. I had got directly opposite, and was about to cross the street when, lo! around the corner, marching rapidly, and with blue coats flapping, buttons and buckles flashing, came a squad of three, seven, nine— ten policemen. They marched straight upon the house with the blinds.

I am not brilliant nor adventurous, but I have been told that I am good, and I do strive to be respectable, and pay my taxes and pew rent. As a corollary to this, I loathe with a loathing unutterable to be involved in a mess of any kind. The squad of policemen were about to enter the house with the blinds, and not for worlds would I have been found by them upon its steps. The nurse-girl might heave that shrieking infant over the cliff of Telegraph Hill, it were all one with me. So I shrank back upon the sidewalk and watched what followed.

Fifty yards from the house the squad broke into a run, swarmed upon the front steps, and in a moment were thundering upon the front door till the stained glass leaped in its leads and shivered down upon their helmets. And then, just at this point, occurred an incident which, though it had no bearing upon or connection with this yarn, is quite queer enough to be set down. The shutters of one of the top-story windows opened slowly, like the gills of a breathing fish, the sash raised some six inches with a reluctant wail, and a hand groped forth into the open air. On the sill of the window was lying a gilded indian-club, and while I watched, wondering, the hand closed upon it, drew it under the sash, the window dropped gullotine-fashion, and the shutters clapped to like the shutters of a cuckoo clock. Why was the indian club lying on the sill? Why, in Heaven's name, was it gilded? Why did the owner of that mysterious groping hand seize upon it at the first intimation of danger? I don't know—I never will know. But I do know that the thing was eldritch and uncanny, ghostly even, in the glare of that cheerless afternoon's sun, in that barren park, with the trade winds thrashing up from the seaward streets.

Suddenly the door crashed in. The policemen vanished inside the house. Everything fell silent again. I waited for perhaps fifty seconds — waited, watching and listening, ready for anything that might happen, expecting I knew not what — everything.

Not more than five minutes had elapsed when the policemen began to reappear. They came slowly, and well they might, for they carried with them the inert bodies of six gentlemen. Wen I say carried I mean it in its most literal sense, for never in all my life have I seen six gentlemen so completely, so thoroughly, so hoplessly and helplessly intoxicated. Well dressed they were, too, one of them even in full dress. Salvos of artillery could not have awakened that drunken half dozen, and I doubt if any one of them could even have been racked into consciousness.

Three hacks appeared (note that the patrol-wagon was conspicuously absent), the six were loaded upon the cushions, the word was given and one by one the hacks rattled down Stockton street and disappeared in the direction of the city. The captain of the squad remained behind for a few moments, locked the outside doors in the deserted shuttered house, descended the steps, and went his way across the park, softly whistling a quick-step. In time he too vanished. The park, the rows of houses, the wind-flogged streets, resumed their normal quiet. The incident was closed.

Or was it closed? Judge you now. Next day I was down upon the wharves, gripsack in hand, capped and clothed for a long sea voyage. The "Mary Baker's" boat was not yet come ashore, but the beauty lay out there in the stream, coquetting with a bustling tug that circled about her, coughing uneasily at intervals. Idle sailormen, 'longshoremen and stevedores sat upon the stringpiece of the wharf chewing slivers and spitting reflectively into the water. Across the intervening stretch of bay came the noises from the "Mary Baker's" decks—noises that were small and distinct, as if heard through a telephone, the rattle of blocks, the straining of a windlass, the bos'n's whistle, and once the noise of sawing. A white cruiser sat solidly in the waves over by Alcatraz, and while I took note of her the flag was suddenly broken out and I heard the strains of the ship's band. The morning was fine. Tamalpais climbed out of the water like a rousing lion. In a few hours we would be off on a voyage to the underside of the earth. There was a note of gayety in the nimble air, and one felt that the world was young after all, and that it was good to be young with her.

A bum-boat woman came down the wharf, corpulent and round, with a roll in her walk that shook first one fat cheek and then the other. She was peddling trinkets amongst the wharf-loungers — pocket combs, little round mirrors, shoestrings and collarbuttons. She knew them all, or at least was known to all of them, and in a few moments she was retailing to them the latest news of the town. Soon I caught a name or two, and on the instant was at some pains to listen. The bum-boat woman was telling the story of the house with the blinds:

"Sax of um, an' nobs ivry wan. But that bad wid bug-juice! Whoo! Niver have Oi seen the bate! An' divil a wan as can remimber owt for two days by, bory-eyed they were. Struck dumb an' deef an' dead wid whiskey and bubble-wather. Not a manjack av um can tell the tale, but wan av um used his knife cruel bad. Now which wan was it? Howse the coort to find out?"

It appeared that the house with the blinds was, or had been, a gambling house, and what I had seen had been a raid. Then the rest of the story came out, and the mysteries began to thicken. That same evening, after the arrest of the six inebriates, the house had been searched. The police had found evidences of a drunken debauch of a monumental character. But they had found more. In a closet under the stairs the dead body of a man—a well dressed fellow—beyond a doubt one of the party, knifed to death by dreadful slashes in his loins and at the base of his spine in true evil hand-over-back fashion.

Now this is the mystery of the house with the blinds.

Beyond all doubt, one of the six drunken men had done the murder. Which one? How to find out? So completely were they drunk that not a single one of them could recall anything of the previous twelve hours. They had come there with their friend the day before. They woke from their orgie to learn that one of them had been worried him to his death by means of a short palm-broad dagger taken from a trophy of Persian arms that hung over a divan.

Whose hand had done it? Which one of them was the murderer? I could fancy them—I think I can see them now, sitting there in their cell, each man apart, withdrawn from his fellow-reveler, and each looking furtively into his fellow's face, asking himself, "Was it you? Was it you? or was it I ? Which of us, in God's name, has done this thing?"

Well, it was never known. When I came back to San Francisco a year or so later I asked about the affair of the house with the blinds, and found that it had been shelved with the other mysterious crimes. The six men had actually been "discharged for want of evidence."

But for a long time the thing harassed me. More than once since I have gone to that windy park, with its quivering flagstaff and Geodetic monument, and, sitting on a bench opposite the house, asked myself again and again the bootless questions. Why had the drunken nurse-maid mentioned the house to me in the first place? and why at that particular time? Why had she lied to me in telling me that she lived there? Why was that gilded indian-club on the sill of the upper window? and whose—here's a point—whose was the hand that drew it inside the house? and then, of course, last of all, the ever-recurrent question, which one of those six inebriates should have stood upon the drop and worn the cap—which one of the company had knifed his friend and bundled him into that closet under the stairs? Had he done it during the night of the orgie, or before it? Was his friend drunk at the time, or sober? I never could answer these questions, and I suppose I shall never know the secret of "The House With the Blinds."

A Greek family lives there now, and rent the upper story to a man who blows the organ in the Russian Church, and to two Japanese, who have a photograph gallery on Stockton street. I wonder to what use they have put the little closet under the stairs?

THE GOLD CRAZE

True Inwardness of Conditions at Coffee Creek.

For more than a week past the daily press of this city has been filled with the wildest and most extravagant stories of the marvelously rich strikes which have been made on Coffee Creek, in Trinity county. As a consequence, crowds of ignorant and inexperienced men are flocking in there, whence they will return both sadder and wiser, having exchanged money they, possibly, can very ill spare, for experiences they would much rather have been without. Trinity county has been represented as a sort of terra incognita, an undiscovered country where men had only to go in to find gold by the bushel. It probably is an unknown county to most people who took no interest in gold mining until the Klondike boom appealed to their imagination, but Trinity stood second among the gold producing counties of the State only three years ago, and to-day stands fifth on the list. Trinity produces considerably over a million in gold annually, and it is evident therefore that this fact cannot have escaped the notice of the many mining men who abound in San Francisco and other parts of the State.

No statement seems too absurd for the daily papers to publish. One of them tells us that Coffee Creek is an ideal place for the prospector; he can sleep out summer and winter. This is undoubtedly quite true, and the only objection to it is that when a man sleeps out in winter, he sleeps so soundly that he never awakens again. This is a peculiarity which Coffee Creek has in common with other places where there is a snowfall of some forty feet, and where the thermometer stands off and on about zero. A fisherman, we are told, will often get from $10 to $15 to the pan near Morrison gulch, and yet, strange to say, one may pass Morrison gulch seven days in the week and see neither fisherman nor panner. Deer, bear, and grouse are said to abound, but at this season of the year the deer, wiser than the men, are going out, and even an active hunter, well acquainted with the country, could not count on getting one every three days. Bear and grouse, if not as unknown, are, at least, an infinitesimal quantity. Another newspaper assures its readers that the whole crew employed by the Trinity Placer Company deserted for Hickory Creek, leaving the Superintendent alone with the Chinese cook. Here we are in a dilemma, for either the editor has manufactured this story out of whole cloth, or else it was a somewhat audacious statement on the part of the gentleman to whom it is attributed, as, on his way to Redding, three days after the strike was made, he dined at the company's camp, with the company's crew and had, therefore, the evidence of his own eyes that not one man had deserted. A third correspondent gives a glowing account of the nuggets he saw at that company's office, and as these included the fabulous Murphy and Burgess find of, according to the San Francisco papers, $80,000, this is not surprising, but all the same I am credibly informed the total amount would not exceed $300 all told.

When one examines the actual facts upon which this great boom has been raised, it is discovered that they form a very slender foundation. The two Graves brothers and their partner, Henry Carter, found some very rich gravel in a small gulch towards the head of Morrison gulch, and took out some $4,000 last spring, but they had a very poor supply of water, which soon failed them. Later they traced the pay rock up till they struck this pocket which they have worked out. How much they have taken out seems uncertain, but one thing is positive, they did not take out, and have never claimed to have taken out, a $42,000 nugget. They did take out a large nugget, which they estimated was worth about $10,000. That they may find other pockets is possible, and we sincerely hope they will. Failing this, they can fall back on the gravel in the gulch below, and to work this they must find water which is not a very easy thing to do. The other find is that of Murphy and Burgess, reported by the papers to be $80,000. They struck a seam and in a couple of days had taken out about $150. They are in hopes the seam may continue for some distance, and prove as rich as it was at the beginning. Beyond this, several quartz prospects have been struck, but there is no certainty that the ledges go down and will make permanent mines.

Coffee Creek itself is no poor man's mine. The gravel is from thirty to forty feet deep, and bedrock can only be reached and work carried on at very great expense, owing to the large quantity of water which has to be pumped. In the upper reaches of the creek the gravel is fine and easy handled, but for the last fourteen miles it is very heavy, many of the boulders weighing many tons. Nearly every side gulch is located by men who have worked them with varying success, but in no case have they made more than fair wages. There is a good deal of quartz float all over the mountains, some of it showing free gold, but until it has been established that the ledges go down and are likely to make permanent mines, this is a somewhat precarious outlook for a prospector. In some places there are traces of copper, but no ledge has yet been struck, and it is doubtful if a ledge sufficiently rich, or sufficiently large, to admit of its being worked in such a remote part of the country, is likely to be found.

That Coffee Creek is no very simple mining proposition is proved by the fact that from the top to the bottom it is one huge succession of failures. Many years ago the Nash Deep Gravel Mining Company opened a mine and acquired patents for the whole of the the upper seven miles of the creek. Ditches were dug, buildings and a fine sawmill erected and a very large sum of money spent. Unfortunately, money could not purchase the one thing needful—grade—and after some three seasons they could neither get the gravel to run into or out of their flumes, and rich as they had proved the ground to be, the company collapsed. Later the Msssrs. Chapman Brothers of San Francisco attempted to hydraulic a passage for the tailings through what was supposed to be an old channel. Unfortunately, it proved to be no channel at all, and they had their trouble and a very large expenditure for nothing. The present company, which rejoices in the name of the Trinity Gold Placer Mining Syndicate, Limited, acquired the Nash property on Upper Coffee Creek and the Blythe property on the lower part of the creek, including the Blythe ditch. They commenced drifting under the bed of the creek, but unfortunately struck into what was apparently an old landslide, where the whole bed of the creek had been broken up. They continued this operation for about a year, but at last abandoned it, at least for the time. They must have spent a large amount in this operation, but claim that the prospects they got warranted them in opening a hydraulic mine at the lower end of the property to work the gravel systematically from there up. This has been a big operation, including a big rock tunnel of some 600 feet. By running this tunnel they believe they have succeeded in overcoming the difficulty as to grade above. They are now ready and only waiting for water, and next spring will decide whether they have made a success where so many have failed.

So far, the only fact established about Coffee Creek is that the bed of that creek and some of its tributaries are rich, at places very rich, but, owing to want of grade and the great depth of the gravel, it is no easy matter to open a mine, and it can only be done with a very large expenditure of capital.

GREAT CALIFORNIANS

E. D. Baker, Statesman and Soldier — The Last of the Senators.

There was a certain period in the history of the United States, just when the West was opening up and the people on the Eastern seaboards were turning towards the Mississippi Valley and the great reaches of country beyond, that seems to have been unusually productive of what the world has agreed to call great men. Tremendous fellows, strong as iron, often as cruel; hard-handed, hard-headed leaders, indomitable as to courage; orators, too, who knew how to play upon a crowd as upon a key-board. Fighters as well; always in favor of the next war, whatever it might be; smelled the battle afar off, and were brave not because they despised danger, but because they loved it. They were in no sense men of the closet. These tremendous ante-bellum fellows were not thinkers. They were made for action, and managed to create action wherever they went. And such action! We see them first about 1832, serving in the Black Hawk war, shooting down Indians along the frontiers and on the banks of the Bad Axe River, and we say good-bye to one of the greatest of them at the battle of Ball's Bluff in Virginia in 1861, when Colonel Baker—Edward Dickinson Baker—fell, shot to death at the head of his troop.

Edward Dickinson Baker was a type of the great men of the days before the war. The State-makers and party-formers and nation-builders, the rugged, strong, resistless men who did as they pleased and bent multitudes to their will with a power not to be resisted. California has had more than her share of this sort of men. They were made for the kind of life that was lived here in the days when the thinker and the student and the closet man was sadly handicapped and a man was worth just what he could actually do, and no more. We have had our great men here as well who built up and founded this West Coast country, just as the Pilgrim Fathers built up and founded New England. We have had the Lockwoods and the Ralstons, and the

Baker at the time of his election to the Senate

Colemans, the Brodericks and the Bakers, just as the Middle West has her Lincolns and Douglasses and Grants, and the East had her Adamses and Franklins.

In the New World there is often a tremendous difference between the place and circumstance of a man's death and the condition of his birth. Baker, who was to be killed on the battlefield at the head of republican troops, was born in an obscure, commonplace street in sober, solid, gray old monarchical London. He was afterwards heard to lament this fact, bemoaning it as a circumstance which precluded him from the Presidency of the United States—as though it were the only obstacle. In 1815 the family emigrated to America, and a few years later young Baker began life as a weaver in Philadelphia. But the family were true Anglo-Saxons, and were forever turning their faces Westward. Little by little they went farther West, farther West, first to Indiana, then to Illinois, settling at length in Carollton, in the last named State. Here young Baker began to study law, rose in his profession, married a wife, begot children, and, just as all his friends believed him about to settle quietly down beneath the cares of a family and the responsibilities of business, shifted the whole burden from his shoulders at a single fling and was off to the Black Hawk war, though it never appeared that he gained any especial distinction there.

But Baker's real career began after the Black Hawk business, when he moved from Carollton to Springfield. This was in 1835, and when he was in his twenty-nfth year. At once he was thrown in contact with some of the greatest lawyers and statesmen of the times, for no town of the West could boast of such an array of forensic and political talent as could this same Springfield in 1835. Lincoln was there, and Douglass, McDougald, Shields, Logan, Trumbull and Stuart. In two years Baker got himself elected to the Illinois Legislature, and by 1845 he took his seat in the National Congress, defeating John Calhoun by seven hundred votes. And now one would surely believe that he was at last fairly launched upon a civil career. The Mexican war broke out and all other considerations were forgotten; Congress might go hang as soon as there was fighting to be done. In fourteen days Baker had abandoned his seat in Congress, raised and equipped a regiment and was on his way to the front. He was soon in the thick of things, practically won the battle of Cerro Gordo for General Scott, and it was only the mustering out of his regiment prevented him from continuing the campaign up to the gates of the City of Mexico. Next we hear of him in Central America, pushing forward and at length completing the Panama Railroad, and immediately thereafter, in 1852, at forty-one years of age, Colonel Baker came to California.

So great was the power of the man, and so widespread his fame already achieved, that in two years he was in the midst of a political campaign, a candidate of the Free Soil party. But the State was largely Democratic in those days, and the result of the canvass was a defeat for Baker—his first. In 1856 he championed the Fremont and Dayton cause on the Pacific Coast, and as a leader of that forlorn hope, was again beaten, and subsequently met a Waterloo as a candidate for Congress. Rebuffs like these would have broken the spirit of a less determined individual than Baker, while every one of them would have meant the political death of one less honest. But the tremendous magnetism of the man, the charm of his oratory and the power of his political genius had begun to win him adherents from all sides and all parties, when, in '59, occurred the event which, more than anything else, influenced Baker's life and at the same time prompted him to one of the most famous funeral orations since the time of Bossuet.

On the 16th of September, 1859, Senator David C. Broderick was killed in a duel with Judge Terry. The body of the dead Senator was conveyed to the Plaza; a vast crowd assembled before the tribune, and while the bells of the city were tolled, Colonel Baker ascended the rostrum and delivered an address which made him famous from San Diego to Oregon. It was probably as splendid an effort of oratory as was ever heard west of the Mississippi, and it moved the men of the Pacific Coast as they have seldom been moved since. Of course it is impossible to say just what effect the oration had upon the people, but it is no less significant that Colonel Baker's next canvass was brilliantly successful.

Baker's public career in California had shown him the impossibility of political advancement under the circumstances then ruling. So, shortly after the death of Broderick he removed to Oregon. Once there, he began an exciting and vigorous canvass. The country was new and remote. Baker could easily be made to appear in the light of an intruder and an alien, unacquainted with the wants and needs of the people; but so resistless was his personality, so persuasive and convincing his oratory and so matchless his skill as a campaigner that in the end he triumphed over all opposition and was chosen by Oregon to represent her in the Senate.

This time the height of Baker's ambition was reached; he touched the goal of his hopes, and stood where all his life he had wished to stand, where Webster and Clay and all the greater statesmen of the country had stood before him—upon the floor of the United States Senate. He was elected Senator from Oregon in 1860, defeating David Logan, the Republican nominee; and curious as it may appear, this Western lawyer, this exhorter of crowds and rouser of backwoods men, was never more at his ease, appeared to never so good an advantage as in the calm, restrained and dignified debates of the Senate Chamber, as when, for instance, in the second of his great speeches he addressed that body for two days opposing certain constitutional amendments offered by Senator (afterward President) Johnson. It was also at this time he made speeches advocating the Pacific railroads and the transcontinental telegraph and the one in which he made his famous reply to Breckinridge. Then came the war, and, as he had done throughout the whole course of his life, Baker rushed at once from the court to the camp, and in Philadelphia, where so many years before he had plied the weaver's shuttle, humblest of apprentices, he began to enlist the "California regiment." The prestige of his name filled it almost immediately, and the same reason no doubt actuated President Lincoln to tender him the commission of Brigadier-General. Baker refused, since acceptance would have forfeited his right to his seat in the Senate, and on the adjournment of Congress joined his regiment in the field. This was in August. By the 20th of October, Baker was as ever, in the thick of the fighting. On the 21st, while covering the retreat of a position of his own troops at Ball's Bluff, in Virginia, he was shot and killed. The body was recovered, sent to Washington, and embalmed and transported, at the public expense, to San Francisco and buried in Lone Mountain Cemetery.

Colonel Baker's leading characteristic was his individuality. His was a self-confidence and a self-reliance of an extraordinary intensity. He felt his strength, knew what he could accomplish and how far he could go. He was a law unto himself, asked no man's judgment or opinion when he felt himself capable of deciding. He was in no sense a follower upon the heels of civilization or convention. He was a leader, and born to be such. He was never willing to pursue the beaten track of other men's experience, but continually sought to make a way for himself. He was a little vain, perhaps, and popular favor was the breath of his nostrils. But trifles had no hold upon him; he lived for the big things of life, for events rather than for circumstances, for the nation rather than for party, for humanity rather than for the State.

New York Celebrities, and Their Plans for the Winter.

I have had a great week. NewYork is at its gayest now, everybody who is anybody is here. making ready for the winter, and what with authors and dramatists, actresses and artists the place fairly swarms with celebrities. Most of them I have seen; seen and talked with, Edison and Ethel Barrymore, Mrs. Hodgson Burnett, Mansfield and—well, to begin with, the Wizard. I dined with the Wizard, if you can call cold mutton, tea, cheese, pie and cakes dinner, simple fare enough, wasn't it, now, simple enough for a millionaire, and Edison is that easily.

ETHEL BARRYMORE

"Pah!" says he, "no food with frills on it for me." Result, physique like iron and a capacity for hard work that permits him to be in his laboratory from 7 A. M. to 11 at night. In the dining-room—of a Spartan plainness—was a photograph. It was hung on the wall and was the only ornament.

"Look at it," said the great man to me shamefacedly, isn't it rot."

MAUDE ADAMS

You know what that photograph was; it was a picture of the medals and orders that have been given to Edison. Men have sold their honor and the good name of their families to have possessed the least of them; plenty of others have killed themselves in their efforts to gain one.

"If it wasn't for my wife, I'd chuck 'em in the waste basket," said Edison.

I noticed the Wizard's skin was wrinkled queerly, and his hair was falling out. "It's the X-ray work," he told me, grinning, "and my left eye is about a foot out of focus; no plaything this Roentgen ray, I can tell you; fortunately the effects are only temporary."

That same evening a party of us lucky ones had a late supper with Richard Mansfield, a delicious supper at Delmonico's, at which I make no doubt Mr. Edison would have sniffed scornfully. Mr. Mansfield, however, was full of his new book, which Page & Co. of Chicago are to publish.

JULIA ARTHUR

"Is it a novel?" I asked him, "or short stories, or fanciful sketches, or—"

"It's none of them, and yet it's all," said Mansfield. "I call it 'Blown Away.' It's a book for children from 6 years old to 60, and relates the surprising adventures of Beatrice and Jessie. I wrote it to amuse my little niece, three summers ago, and its publication was a matter of accident—"

"On account of the urgent entreaties of your friends?" some one suggested maliciously. Mansfield continued severely: "Beatrice and Jessie encounter a storm in the first chapter and are 'blown far away,' —first to the court of Victoria, then to Robinson Crusoe's island, and then to Noah's Ark. You see, they are as independent of time as of place."

RICHARD MANSFIELD

Mr. Mansfield kindly allowed me to look over the M. S. It's good reading. ("Clever drivel," he called it.) the finale involving a boarding-house fairy and an enchanted Prince, who is released from the spell by an incantation, whose most potent words are: "Order two more beers."

By the way, Ethel Barrymore is once more chez elle, and announces definitely that she is not engaged to be married, and hasn't the vaguest intention of being so. Poor man—whoever he is—somebody's heart will break over this statement. But what a time she's had, this little 18-year-old American, chaperoned by Duchesses, just like Mr. Gibson's "American girl abroad."

"You know," she said, "my engagement with Sir Henry Irving was a matter of the greatest surprise to me. It came just as I was on the point of leaving for America. Ellen Terry wrote me a little note to the effect that I would hear of something to my advantage if I would drive over to the Lyceum that night. Of course, I went, and there was the offer waiting for me. Sir Henry asked me to go on with him in 'Sans Gene,' 'The Bells,' and 'Peter the Great.'"

"And socially," we asked her, "you had a pleasant time?"

"Oh, delightful," said Miss Barrymore, rapturously. "I met Bret Harte and Harold Frederick, Conan Doyle, Anthony Hope, and Alma Tadema, and a score of others, and every one was so good to me. Only you mustn't ask me anything more about them, because I won't talk of the celebrities I've met. My engagement with Irving is indefinitely long. I'm to be in America ten days, and then return for the Lyceum rehearsals. My first part is to be Euphroseyne, in 'Peter the Great.' She is the peasant girl with whom Peter's son Alexis is in love."

Last of all I called on Miss Maude Adams. But here what a state of things. My! how the poor young lady was agitated. Fancy an actress in doubt as to which of two plays she is to open a starring tour with three weeks before the first night! She doesn't even know what dresses to order.

"What's the difficulty, Miss Adams?" I asked her.

"Why," she said, "it is to be either 'Phroso' of Mr. Hope, or 'The Little Minister' of Barrie; we have both plays, barring the last acts. Both plays are equally good as far as we have read them; which ever one has the best last act will be the one we will choose."

"And these last acts?"

"Neither of them have arrived yet."

Was ever an unfortunate lady in such a state of mind?

"Mr. Frohman had the wires and cables hot all day yesterday, trying to find Mr. Hope or Mr. Barrie, both of whom—of course—are away from home, traveling. The time is getting shorter, and what to do I'm sure I don't know. The costumes! Think of that! I should have decided upon them weeks ago. However, I shall wait but two days more, and then order the costumes for both parts. Perhaps I shall be able to sleep o' nights after that."

Speaking at a banquet in London lately Mr. Seddon, Premier of New Zealand, stated that the Maori race, which he styled a noble one, is once more on the increase, and will, therefore, be saved to the world.

WASHINGTON GOSSIP

Recent Doings of the Statesmen at the National Capital.

Washington, D. C.—Mr. McKinley is hardly warm in his Presidential chair, but I am inclined to believe that he has already discovered the fact that there is more than one bent pin upon the seat. It is not yet known what course he will pursue in the Wimberley affair, but no one at all acquainted with the President's character believes he can have the face to sanction Mr. Hanna's candidate for the post of Customs Collector at New Orleans. On the other hand, if Wimberley's appointment was an ante-election promise made by his political manager, what is His Excellency to do. If he does not appoint Wimberley he breaks faith with Mark—and he can hardly afford to do that. If he does appoint that much-talked-of man he will draw down upon himself the censure of the entire Nation and at the same time lose Mr. Gage. Indeed, the Secretary of the Treasury has gone so far as to refuse flatly to countenance the appointment of Wimberley, and has declared his intention of resigning if the President and Mr. Hanna conclude the affair in spite of his protest. For the uninformed it may be necessary to say that Wimberley has become malodorous of late because of his offer to sell a place in the Auditor's office to a certain Mrs. Guyol, the price being the honor of her eighteen-year-old daughter. It is a nasty business to come so near to the Executive, and we are all hoping that Mr. McKinley will take firm stand in the matter.

Secretary of State Sherman is another thorn in the President's side, or, perhaps, I should say another bent pin in his chair of state. Of course we all know that Mr. Sherman was moved out of the Senate to make a place for Mr. Hanna, being lured away with the offer of the Secretaryship. To those "on the inside" it was an understood thing that Mr. Sherman was to be a figure-head, his assistant, Mr. Day, taking over real charge. Unhappily, Mr. Sherman wants to play in the game himself, has done so, in fact, and the result is the lamentable scandal—among a score of others—of the Behring Sea dispatch.

But keep an eye on Mr. McKinley. The great man is long-suffering and slow to anger, and permits a familiarity on the part of his subordinates that is democratic in the extreme, but beneath that easy-going exterior there are undreamed of potentialities. Senator Mason suddenly discovered the fact about a week ago, and is yet wondering just what kind of charge he managed to explode. It seems that the pussy, puffy, florid litte Senator bustled into the President's room last Wednesday, and without any form of introduction or deference, exclaimed, "How about that appointment?" Mr. McKinley stared at him a moment and replied that the matter would be looked into when its turn came. "Look here," Mason is said to have answered, "you can't jolly me. You're going back on your friends and have an eye out for the men that opposed you." Slowly the President rose to his full height—the Major can look very commanding in that closely-buttoned frock coat when occasion demands—"Mr. Mason," said he, with a warning gleam in his eye, "that is unjust, ungenerous, and untrue," then resumed his seat and turned his back. Mason stood spellbound an instant and then got nimself away with such dignity as he could muster. I believe he apologized next day.

All of which goes to prove that the President can put his foot down hard enough when necessary, and that the Shermans and Reids and Wimberleys, and even—yes, even—the Hannas may yet find they have a man on their hands who is the master of them all.

EVOLUTION OF A FRESHMAN

Undergraduate Life at the University of California.

Almost the first thing that happens to a University of California freshman—and it generally happens before the ink of his registration is dry or the leaves of his new text-books are cut—is the Rush. There are two kinds of rushing at Berkeley, rushing by the fraternities and rushing by the sophmore class. Rushing by the fraternities gives the freshman a beautiful idea of the whole-hearted cordiality and genial hospitality of the college student; rushing by the sophomore class leaves him in doubt. The fraternity rushing is for the purpose of inducing desirable, gentlemanly, well-groomed fellows to join a particular Greek letter society. Several of these societies usually make a bid for the same man if he is of the proper sort, and out-rival each other in showing him attention. They ask him to lunch, inquire quietly as to his health, show a flattering interest in his college career, advise him solemly against the fast set of the other "frat," give evidence of being tremendously struck with his sister, and introduce him to their alumni. After two weeks of this the freshman is putting on his hat with a shoe-horn and patronizes the president of the college and the Academic Senate. Then at this juncture one of two things happen, the freshman joins a "frat," or else engages in his first freshman-sophomore rush. Either event is a wholesome tonic. As often as not, the miserable wretch takes the double dose. Once the "frat" initiation is over, and he is safely pinned to a particular society by means of the curious little Greek letter emblem, he suddenly discovers that his importance has evaporated in a single night. His "fraties" no longer ask him to lunch—he can come without being asked, or stay away, just as he pleases—his athletic career ceases to be of momentous concern, interest in his sister dwindles, and the alumni no longer clap him familiarly and pleasantly upon the shoulder. His fraternity brothers discuss and comment upon his short-comings and innocence and ignorance of the college world with an abruptness and fluency that are discouraging. He is expected to answer the door-bell and the telephone, and to decorate the house on public days, while any expression or indication of independence or self-importance is met with sarcasm and riotous opprobium, tempered with wit about as delicate as a brick-bat.

If there is any spirit left in him after this the sophomore class are generous in their efforts at its elimination. Goaded on by the taunts of the upper class-men and made to understand that to "rush" the sophomores is the whole duty of the incoming class, the novices are bundled into old clothes and foot-ball suits—lucky if they have time even for that—and are turned loose, a shouting, panic-stricken rout upon the ranks of the foe. A "rush" ensues; nothing very serious, hardly worse than a wrestling match on a large scale, but it generally happens at night and with an unexpectedness and apparent ferocity, straining to the nerves. After this the freshman is expected to be, and generally is, sufficiently humbled ; he begins to know his own place, and to look about him and take stock of the little world of college.

The fraternity system obtains largely at Berkeley, perhaps more largely than in any other college of its size in America. All the more desirable and popular men are gathered together into clubs—"Greek letter societies." Among the better known national fraternities who have chapters at Berkeley are Delta Kappa Epsilon, Phi Gamma Delta, Beta Theta Pi, and Chi Phi—The "Big Four"—but besides these are some fifteen others including three "sororities" or "girl frats." The fraternities are the social units of the college life and from the undergraduate point of view take charge of everything that does not come within the province of the faculty or Recorder's office. A great deal has been said against the bad influence of this club life upon young men not fitted for it, but one is inclined to believe that the influence is more in an opposite direction for the reason that the better class of these organizations have reputations to maintain, are morbidly jealous of their good name and standing. The center of student life at Berkeley, the "stamping ground" for all four classes, is the lower corridor and front and back steps of "Old North Hall." At any time of the day this locality is crowded; the bulletin boards of students and faculty are here, and the assembly room, which is a general headquarters for anything, from the preparation of a recitation to the planning of a rush. It is also from the coign of vantage afforded by the sun-warmed steps that the seniors and juniors watch the lower classmen toiling through military drill with proper exultation and fitting ridicule.

The juniors and seniors are the privileged classes of the college. They have fewer hours, infinitely more leisure, are granted more indulgences by the faculty, are eligible for membership in the Skull and Keys Society, and, more glorious than all, can wear the "plug." The "plug" custom is the one custom which the University of California can claim as distinctive; no other college has it; it was copied from nowhere; it originated Heaven only knows how, and you will go far before you can see the curious spectacle of a young gentleman in faultless tweeds and unimpeachable neckwear disporting himself in public view, his head surmounted by a battered stove-pipe hat, that would be an exaggeration even in the costume of a low-Irish comedian, as in one of "Zim's" unspeakable caricatures. The "plug" is respectable at first—is assumed on class day, the junior donning the white "plug," the senior the black—but in the course of the week it is thumped and kicked and battered to a shape that closely resembles an accordion in repose. There is an unwritten law that no man must ever be guilty of repairing his "plug" or buying a new one, and, indeed, the "plugs" of the preceding classes are those most sought after.

Apropos of the juniors and seniors, it will be well to mention the Skull and Keys Society, membership in which is the most coveted distinction in all the social organizations of the college, and the president of this society can take unto himself the satisfaction of being the most prominent man in college, bar the captain of the eleven. The society is dramatic as well as social, and once a year presents a play, in which the female parts are taken by the boys. Admission to the play is by invitation only, and its performance is quite a society event for the people of Oakland and San Francisco. There is no "rushing" for this aristocratic society; indeed, the tables are exactly reversed, for the society does not so much seek the candidates as the candidates seek the society, consequently the elected juniors are put through all manner of absurd paces, such as fishing in the dry bed of Strawberry Creek, shooting quail upon the campus at the time of the football practice, hauling ten trains of cars in front of Morse Hall, and peddling the Salvation Army "War Cries" among the students. It has become a custom also for the successful candidates to assemble on the fence around the football field, dressed exactly alike in black coats, junior plugs and white duck trousers, each with his left arm bound with red ribbon.

THE EXTRAVAGANT SEX

Are American Women More Lavish Than Their European Sisters?

Mrs. Haryot Stanton-Blatch, daughter of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, has accused American women of extravagance, downright reckless extravagance. As a result of this a mighty murmur has come from the camps of the accused, and oddly enough part of it sides in with Mrs. Blatch, noticeably the passionate treble of Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Ella thinks American women are extravagant, most of them, anyway. Extravagance is America's national characteristic—extravagance in money, in thought, in speech and in action, and when an extravagant man pets and pampers and spoils his wife—how can she help being pettish and wilful , and as a direct result—extravagant? There are very few able to resist the temptation. All this from the passionate Ella, but there are others mighty in the world of women, and Mrs. Russell A. Alger is one of them. Mrs. Alger is great, inasmuch as she is purely and simply a woman devoid of the advanced ideas and professional fads characteristic of so many of her sisters. Otherwise, she is the wife of Secretary of War Alger, who, in private life, has a million or more. Mrs. Alger ought to know something about the domestic ways of domestic women, and she thinks American women compare most favorably in the matter of economy with their sisters of other countries. Women are seldom wasteful, thinks Mrs. Alger, since it is their nature to make the most of a little, and this trait is a great help to them after marriage.

But Mrs. John Sherman is of the belief that after marriage the American woman practices the trait of extravagance more than any other trait. And to this very extravagance is due those sudden failures in commercial life, of which the papers tell us so much. She goes so far as to say that it is in the matter of clothes that this extravagance is principally exhibited. Like Jezebel of old, who stood on the walls of—somewhere in the Bible—it is a question of self-adornment, and before the temple of fashion must fall the fortunes of many a man.

Quick upon the well-kept heels of Mrs. Sherman comes Dr. Sarah French Battery, who is also prone to declare that American women in their households, as well as in personal expenses, live beyond their means. The medical Sarah looks to France for redemption. There is a simplicity, she says, and daintiness about the French that the American woman can neither understand nor imitate. This, it would seem, places the American woman at an unfortunate discount.

But there is balm in the opinion of Ruth McEnery Stuart, whose name is so often in the magazines. Mrs. Stuart doesn't think her countrywomen are extravagant. On the contrary, they are possessed of noble characters, and they are the best dressed and the most tactful of women as well. You may have read some of this lady's dialect stories, and can gauge the value of her opinion. Mme. Romero, wife of the Mexican Minister, has impressions that harmonize with the amiable ideas of the authoress. She thinks our women are delightful things, and not a bit more expensive than they deserve.

Another soul-absorbing topic concerning woman is the question of whether or not she is bred too fine. A distinguished neurologist boldly steps forth and declares that many a man's career has been totally demolished, all because of his wife's nerves. How can a man accomplish great things in his office when he knows that a fit of hysteria is awaiting him at home. It is trying, it must be admitted, but what can a poor man do? There should be a remedy for such ills, or at least a preventive, though the aforementioned neurologist suggests neither.

Perhaps it is that our women are "bred too fine." Like race horses capable of a magnificent burst of speed one day, they fail the next, because of a lack of stamina. The woman who has been brought up in silk and velvet will do great deeds one day and the next have hysteria. She will kiss her husband good-bye in the morning, and in the afternoon he will find her in bed bathed in tears. Surely an awful bore, such a woman is, but that is the consequence of too "fine breeding."

George Vanderbilt's North Carolina home, Biltmore, is the most wonderful private residence in the world. He has already spent more than $4,000,000 on it, and intends to put in at least $2,000,000 more. He has 180,000 acres and can travel thirty-five miles in a straight line from his door without reaching the boundaries of his estate.

The Phincess de Chimay is said to be now with her Rigo on a small farm in the Tyrol, where, in the blouse of a peasant, she is making butter for the market. Except for a small allowance from an uncle in this country, and the revenue she derives from the sale of her display photos in Paris, she is supposed to have no means.

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

You know, Diary, my dear, that the best laid plans of mice and men gang aft aglee, and even this most joyous of debutantes is obliged sometimes to become a shuttlecock in the hands of fate. In my case Aunt Sybil, as a rule, holds the scales, and when last week I drew fair visions of a fortnight spent between San Mateo and Burlingame I reckoned without my host. On Wednesday Aunt Sybil came bustling up in her pompous way and announced that she and I were going to start on the morrow for Del Monte. "But, Aunt Sybil," I interrupted, "I promised to go to—" "But me no buts, child," said she, "all is arranged. I have spoken to your father, so pack your trunks and meet me at the 2:30 train." I was furious—not that I am not fond of Monterey, but one does like to have a little license occasionally, and Aunt Sybil has all the quips and cranks of several Mrs. Grundys. However, I got together my prettiest frocks and managed to cajole a new parasol out of Mamma, and some lace that Leila's lynx eye has been on for some time past. It was worth the disappointment. Well, I met Aunt Sybil and we journeyed down together. She had engaged lovely rooms on the first floor, as she has an old-fashioned horror of elevators. "Those nasty new-fangled lifts" as she persists in calling them. Though a Colonial Dame, a Daughter of the Revolution, and boasting of all sorts of swell American ancestors, Aunt Sybil will insist on giving things English names because, forsooth, she spent from her third to her sixth year in Canada, "and I can't get out of the way of it, my dear"—such affectation! My own belief is that she is at heart an old-time Tory with oak leaves, [illegible] over-the-water and all that sort of ten-[illegible].

We found a crowd of very jolly people at the Queen of American watering-places, and plenty of dowagers with whom Auntie could gossip to her heart's content. The Carolans, Tobins and Ethel Keeney were among the young people, and we spent our time riding, driving and swimming. Ethel Keeney swims like a mermaid and frolics in the water as though it rather than the land was her natural element. Genevieve Carolan is a dear girl, and so pretty; we had some capital times together. Then I went driving with the Tobins. The younger boys (the late Colonel Tobin's sons) are such nice lads, and so attentive to their aunts, more like mediaeval pages than fin de siecle youths. I quite envied Beatrice and Celia. But the best fun of all was the day we went to Mr. Peters' studio. I did enjoy it so, and believe I shall go in for art. I am sure I have a hitherto undiscovered talent, a sort of light hidden under a bushel effect, you know. So, now, I am going to study and startle the world. I have not confided my aspirations to Aunt Sybil, whose horror of lifts extends to every thing that is up-to-date, and who thinks if a girl paints a few violets passably she is doing all that is expected of a lady. She suspects Leila of strong-mindedness because she plays the violin quite fairly and belonged to the Young Ladies' Orchestra. I believe I have hitherto been her favorite on account of my frivolities and worldliness or "sense," as she calls it. Anyway I was fascinated by Mr. Peters and his studio. We have a room upstairs with a light that would suit admirably, and I could get some rugs and curios and have afternoon teas up there, which would be great sport. Then I love daubing canvases and mixing colors. I am sure I have talent.

Mrs. Hearst came down with a party, including Mrs. Carmichael-Carr. Poor Mrs. Carr, she has just lost her mother, a sweet old lady, one of the most popular women in London in artistic circles. Mrs. Hearst was also in Mr. Peters' studio. I confided my aspirations towards an artistic career in her sympathetic ear, but she did not give me much encouragement and smiled a sort of enigmatical sphinx-like smile which I did not exactly understand. Never mind, I shall get the studio even if the talent remains in an embryonic condition. There was the usual sprinkling of tourist English people; one man I especially liked rode well and played golf. I don't think I shall ever make a success of golf. I have not sufficient concentration, Arthur avers. I can play tennis, but to be really honest, have not succeeded in becoming an enthusiastic golf player, and I loathe plaid stockings. No leg, however shapely, can stand those checkered effects. Then, I don't like to have to pay more attention to the game than to the players, and in golf that is the essential. I once heard of a Scotchman, a stateman, who, when he wanted to play would not even open his telegrams lest they might preoccupy his mind and prevent the giving of his undivided atten to the game. And now, Diary dear, I have returned and shall betake myself to San Mateo to pay my deferred visit. So for another week, adieu. Your loving

MISS CRICKET.

Each succeeding season sees the summer lengthening out, and whereas a few years ago after July most of the country resorts were deserted, now we are in the latter days of August, and more than half of San Francisco is still out of town. The Hopkins are are their country place at Menlo, and the Russell Wilsons are visiting them. The Hagers are still in San Rafael, taking in the paper chases and other amusements. Mrs. Morgan and Miss Theresa Morgan are in Santa Barbara. Miss Ella Morgan is in the East, where she is spending the summer months, making a round of visits. Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Dean and Miss Helen Dean returned from the Hotel Vendome at San Jose, after a six weeks' visit. They anticipate going to Napa Soda Springs nearly next week. Mrs. William Alvord and grand-daughters are at Del Monte, as also are the Tobins and the Burgueres. At Burlingame all the residents are occupying their summer houses, and enjoying the pleasures of polo, riding and driving. Mrs. Irene B. Hooper, Mrs. Jewett, and Miss Rose Hooper are in San Mateo.

Mrs. McNutt, Miss Manie and Rush McNutt sailed last week for Europe, where they anticipate spending a year or so.

The latest acquisition to the San Francisco art colony is Joseph Greenbaum, who arrived from Munich on Monday last. He left San Francisco in 1890, and has been seven years studying under Professor Marr, and other leading artists in the Royal Academy at Munich. He is now busy preparing his atelier, and will shortly show many studies made while abroad, including pictures that were exhibited in Germany and in the Paris Salon.

Quite the most interesting social event of the early future is the marriage of Jack Casserly and Miss Cudahy of Chicago. They are to be wedded during the first week of October in Chicago, but will reside in San Francisco. Though it is not generally understood, the Casserlys are now very wealthy people. When Senator Casserly died he left an estate of three hundred thousand dollars, a great part of which was in outside lands. For a time the family was land poor, but latterly their holdings have come into the market and command a fine rental. It is reasonably certain that Mrs. Casserly has an income of at least twenty-five or thirty thousand a year. She is looking out for a comfortable residence, which her son will occupy when he brings his bride from Chicago. Latterly, Mr. Casserly has devoted himself to his profession and has rather given society and pleasure tthe go-by.

The Art Association has taken in hand the family of the unfortunate Fortune de Conte, who died here recently in want. Some forty sketches have been contributed by well-known artists, and they are to be raffled. Five hundred tickets at $1 each are offered, and the canvases will be distributed by lot.

There is some little movement in society at Sausalito, and the Hutch set entertain sedulously in their own quiet way. Among the latest visitants to stilt city are Mrs. Camillo Martin and Mrs. Bayard Smith, who have cottages on the hill. Mrs. De Ruyter and Miss Ella De Ruyter have left the burg for the season, and gave a large picnic to Redwood Canyon last Sunday by way of farewell.

Though the crowd at the Hotel Rafael has rather thinned out, quite a number of the pleasantest people remain. Mrs. Spreckels and the Hagers are still occupying their cottages. Mr. and Mrs. Tay, the Dodges, Smiths Lilienthals, Gerstles and Slosses are also among the residents. At the hotel are the Boardmans, Davidsons, Crooks, Greens, Folgers, Walters. Though the next paper chase will not create so much excitement as that for the Ingleside Cups, the sport itself has such ardent devotees that the field will not be much smaller. It is proposed to incorporate the Hunt Club of San Rafael, that being the easiest method of straightening out the several problems which have arisen in the direction of the chases.

Herman Oelrichs is at Monterey and is infusing life into the region. Under his leadership entertainments of various kinds have been organized—bowling tournaments, swimming and bicycle races, picnics and supper parties—and are affording that incentive to action which is required to make summer resorts really agreeable. Give Californians a start in the direction of social activity, and they will take advantage of every shade of it. But Mr. Oelrichs has not been content with figuring merely as an organizer. He has also provided silver cups for the winners, which add to the glory of victory. The bowling tournament took place on Wednesday and proved great fun. It was won by Miss Shepard of New York, whose partner was Mr. Tobin. They made a straight score of 611 points. Emil Brugiere and Mrs. Ryer were given the consolation prize for a score of 608, and Miss Beatrice Tobin and Mr. L. Brugiere won the booby prize. The swimming and bicycle races come off on Thursday, too late for this issue. After the bowling tournament, there was a supper in the grill-room, at which the health of the winners was drunk in flowing bowls.

John Drew was the guest of honor at Burlingame on Sunday last. He arrived on the early train, and the Tobins arranged a picnic for him to the lakes. He drove the coach in fine style, and, it is said, established quite a requtation as a driver, by way of defending his skill as against the famous drive in "Rosemary," in which he looked so earnestly into the eyes of his partner that he forgot his task and the ribbons. There was also at Burlingame a baseball match between a team from San Mateo and the Country Club team, which included a quartet of Tobins. They played on the polo ground in the presence of a large audience. There was more enthusiasm, however, than skill exhibited on both sides, and San Mateo won. Just now polo is not very much in evidence. The ground is a bit dusty and hard, and, besides, the illness of Mr. Hobart and the preoccupation of Mr. Baldwin prevent their participation.

Apropos of Drew, the "Chap Book"—one of the brightest papers in the country, by the way—has this story: "For 'Rosemary' Mr. Drew sacrificed his moustache, and of course changed his appearance. This summer Mr. Max Beerbohm saw Mr. Drew in the lobby of a London theater and approached to greet him. For the moment Mr. Drew's memory came near to failing him, but Max's aplomb saved everything. "Oh, Mr. Drew,' he said "I'm afraid you don't remember me without your mustache."

Like the father of the prodigal in the Scriptures, Oakland is stretching forth a welcoming hand to greet the returning wanderers who, wearied with a satiety of bucolic pleasure, again seek their own roof trees.

From Castle Crags, from Lake Tahoe and other sumer reort they come in twos and threes. Last week the Barker and Q. A. Chase families came from the Crags, and Mrs. Sharon, the Misses Sharon, Mr. Harry Farr and Mr. Walter Sievert returned from Tahoe after a thoroughly jolly outing. Of those who are still stopping in the country are Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Stoip, who are at their ranch at Hanford; Miss Coralie Selby, who is at Ben Lomand; Miss Sinclair and Miss Clay, who are tasting the delights of surf bathing at Santa Cruz, and Mrs. Harry Hinckley, who is at St. Helena visiting Mrs. E. M. Chabot.

Quite a leavening of regret is felt in Oakland over the prospective departure of the Misses Vrooman, who go East early next week. Miss May Vrooman anticipates entering the Masachuestts Institute of Technology, Miss Beatrice is to enter Smith's College, and Miss Ray will study law. The Vrooman girls not only possess exceptionally able minds, but the originality that is so rarely an accompaniment. They are interested in the woman's suffrage question, and were among Miss Anthony's supporters in the last campaign.

Original in conception and successful in execution was the Southern Corn Bake given by the ladies of Highland Park last week at the home of Mr. and Mrs. A. M. Rosborough. The entertainment took place in the garden, which was hung in Japanese lanterns. The night was clear and mild, and there was a full moon, which enhanced the scenic value of the occasion. Every one came accompanied by a tin cup and plate, and all sat around a big bonfire, where they baked corn and made hot coffee to their heart's content. Later a vaudeville performance was given in the summer house.

On Friday night last a jolly moonlight picnic was given to Grizzly Peak, back of Berkeley, by Mrs. Charles Webb Howard in honor of her son Harold, who is out here on his vacation. The young people started at about 5 oclock and reached the summit in time to see the sunset. Later a capital supper was spread, and at about 10 o'clock all returned homeward.

A feature of the coming convention of the National Association of Letter-Carriers, to be held in this city early in September, will be the band of the New York delegation, consisting of fifty musicians. The opening exercises of the convention will take place in Odd Fellows' Hall, September 6th. Governor Budd and Mayor Phelan will address the delegates and give them the freedom of the city. The parade the morning of the 6th promises to be especially interesting. The Committees on Funds, Fruits and Wines are now out, and it is expected the public will be generous. The convention is the ninth to be held by the association.

In our last issue of The Wave, Mill Valley was liberally illustrated in half-tone, and certain of the artistic homes of that charming hamlet were pictured. Among the finest scenes was a view from the Butler property and the homes of Mrs. Howells and Mrs. Huber. The Butler property is situated on the sunny side of the valley, just above the Sanitarium Hotel, and commands one of the very best outlooks over the mountain and valley. Mrs. Howells' cottage is on the right as you go toward the Cascades and very convenient to the station. A splendid vista is to be had from here also, and for an all-the-year-round home a more desirable place would be hard to find.

Mrs. Huber's home leaves nothing to be desired. Planned by Emil John, the well-known architect of this city, elegantly finished throughout, admirably situated, it is simply perfect as a country-seat. It must be confessed that our engraving failed to convey an adequate idea of the beauty of this mansion. It transpires that these properties are for sale, and it will be a fastidious home-seeker, indeed, who will not find his every whim satisfied.

THE PLAY OF THE WEEK

"The Heart of Maryland"—an Eclectic Drama.

"The Heart of Maryland" is a striking piece of dramatic architecture, with a strong tendency toward the Eastlake tpye. In it, Belasco has demonstrated to a mathematical nicety just how many melodramatic situations may be crowded into a drama of four acts without overloading the vehicle. The play is a marvel in its way. There is scarcely a trick known to the stage, or an effort known to the property man or electrician, that is not utilized at some point in the development. It is a clever compilation, and you extract from it the same character of pleasure that the married daughter (who has been away from home for years) does when she visits grandma, and discovers in the quilt bedspread on the old lady's feather bed the piece of dress worn by her twenty years ago, "the piece that Mary wore," etc. Old memories are revived, and the experience is not at all disagreeable.

In my salad days I enjoyed the acquaintance of a man who wrote "nigger sketches" for minstrel and variety shows, and he was something of a genius in his way. To me he was a "Being"—of marvelous ingenuity. In those times, "Beazley's Boy" was a popular negro sketch, and the house never failed to roar at the finale of the little farce when "Jumbo Minks" swung about the stage with Beazley's spotted dog (stuffed of course) pinned to the dome of his trousers. There was another sketch that had for its hero a mild, simple-minded kind of a darkey, who innocently went out to calm an obstreperous creditor, and after loud "glass crashes" and violent thumping off the sage, the mild-mannered darkey returned, amid shouts of laughter, with his clothes literally in rags. I imagine there were a half dozen such sketches, all popular at the time, each having some ridiculous denouement upon which the curtain would fall. My friend, the genius, who had been wearing out the tissues of his brain on purely original matter, was one day visited with an inspiration. He wrote a sketch that embodied every climax in every negro sketch he had ever seen. It was a marvel of construction. He wove "Beazley's dog" in with "Handy Andy," slipped the "funny" part of the "Fever Patient" in with "There's a Child Lost." He twisted them here, stitched on a piece there, added a part of one play to this scene, tucked on another piece somewhere else, until he had one of the most ingeniously contrived and skilfully constructed "nigger sketches" the world had ever seen. It took, too—took like mad; and my genius friend went off in such an extended jollification that he died soon after.

His plan of constructing a play did not die with him, however. It has been elaborated and improved upon until it has reached a state of perfection that is exemplified in the "Heart of Maryland." You know the list of war plays as well as I do. There is a suggestion of each of them in Belasco's play. There is the murder scene from "La Tosca," too; a bit from the sterling story, "A Man Without a Country," and "Curfew Shall Not Ring To-Night." To adopt the slang of the street, "there are others," but why itemize? So cleverly has Belasco blended these things into a whole, that, perforce, he must be forgiven. I can only congratulate the gentleman that the play did not receive its initial production in San Francisco, and that it comes here with the stamp of Eastern approval. Otherwise the local critic would have had no mercy on the local author who dared.

The women-folk in the play are not handsome, nor, for that matter, are the men. Mrs. Leslie Carter strikes you as a very hard working and very conscientious little lady. The brunt of the work falls upon her and she bears the burden heroically. Beyond a doubt, the most striking scene of the whole performance is developed at the close of the econd act. It is a bit of the real thing, very strongly put and quite well handled by Mrs. Carter. But where did Belasco get it? The question is pertinent and excusable in view of the familiar things the play does contain. If the idea worked out in this scene is original with Belasco, then he is to be censured for not drawing more heavily upon his own resources, for it is stronger than anything he has confessedly borrowed. I liked the way Malcolm Williams died. He will not look any more dead when the real thing overtakes him, than he did on Tuesday night. It is not an easy thing to die on the stage, and to do it cleverly, but even in this there was a suggestion of something I had seen, as they carried him off the stage, his head drooping over the hastily improvised litter, his wide open eyes staring vacantly at the audience. A whisper from the seat behind me said, "Svengali," and it was like it in effect.

You will go to the Baldwin next week and see this "Heart of Maryland" for yourself, if you have not seen it already. It is a skilfull—quite skilfull and ingenious piece of dramatic work. If it was purely original, it would be a masterpiece, but it is not. We had a little couple at the Columbia some months ago—Russ Whytal and his wife—who gave us "For Fair Virginia." The play was Whytal's own. It had the atmosphere of the South, it had clearly drawn characters, the memory of whom stuck to you the next day. It was a natural, easy going, romance of our Southland during the war, and every line forced the conclusions upon you that its author had striven for natural effects and had given you a play entirely original. Belasco's play has its place in theatricals, but for my own part, and without prejudice, I may write it down that compilation, however clever, do not appeal to me one-half as strongly as one quiet touch of originality. Then, too, I take my plays much as I do architecture, and that, to please me, must be quiet and graceful as to strength, and impressions must grow out of its very simplicity. Plays—like houses—built along such lines go on forever.

In the twelfth week of their reign at the Columbia the Frawley Company have presented Haddon Chambers' entertaining drama "The Idler." The piece itself is a thoroughly well-balanced production that has met with success wherever played, and is evidently acceptable to the local theatregoer. The main plot evolves the subtle machinations of Mark Cross, an unscrupulous, idle London man to compromise and carry off Lady Harding, the wife of his friend Sir John Harding, M. P. Lady Harding is sorely tried in many ways, but never wavers in wifely duty, and eventually scores heavily over both husband and evil-minded lover. The side issues are cleverly worked in and serve to illustrate a strong character in Simeon Strong, an American, the killing in former days of whose brother by Sir John Harding is the source of all the trouble; while Strong's surrender to the charms of the gay and fascinating Kate Merryweather is full of fun and incident. And further, the testy old General Merryweather, Kate's father, who also has matrimonial leanings, involving the two widows, Mrs. Cross, Mark's mother, and Mrs. Glynn-Stanmore affords considerable amusement.

In his rendering of Mark Cross the performance of Frank Worthing is praiseworthy, especially in those portions where action is called for. The Simeon Strong of Frawley is likewise good and thoroughly natural. In Francis Carlyle's representation of the English baronet one is forced to feel disappointment. The character is not perhaps easy to portray, but an accomplished actor would find in it an excellent opportunity for work that its exponent here leaves entirely undone or scamped. Harry Corson Clarke as the General is quite good, and Terry as the valet, in his little part does well. Of the ladies Blanche Bates, as the heroine, attracts rather by her own personal gifts of voice and appearance than by the style in which she sustains the character. Full as it is of womanliness of a high type, Miss Bates in great measure fails to express the fact, and falls short of what seems to be needed to bring out the finer emotions called for. Gladys Wallis as the ingenue Kate is thoroughly at home, bright and clever in her acting, as she is pretty and taking in herself. Phosa McAllister and Madge Carr Cook well enter into the spirit of their parts. Although the effect of the rendering as a whole may prove a little disappointing to one who has seen the piece performed by other companies, the little drama itself is so much above the average of modern plays that it is well worth seeing.

The literary merit of "The Heart of Chicago" is not obvious, but then literary merit is not supposed to be a feature of melodrama—action is the thing, and scenery as well. There is plenty of both at Morosco's, plenty of action and plenty of scenery, and mentioning scenery, it may be said that the setting of the fourth act is exceptionally good—the effect of the approaching engine is at once thrilling and realistic. Another effective scene is at the close of the first act, representing the ruins of Chicago. Mamie Holden, the new soubrette, has succeeded in making a good impression, her singing is acceptable and her dancing as much so, but her articulation needs looking to—it is not sufficiently distinct.

MUSIC

An excess of enthusiasm seized Tivoli singers, audience and orchestra last Monday, such as is seldom experienced in these non-enthusiastic musical regions. Many better performances have gone by without as much as stirring a single shout of encouragement; however, that is past, and it may be that our public is beginning to wake. If any vigorous performance of a Wagner opera is going to make an impression on an audience, "Lohengrin" should at least be that one. For, in "Lohengrin" there is the distinctly popular element—as a drama pre-eminently, and as a musical picture only in a lesser degree. All the great qualities of Wagner's genius shine in a more genial spirit in this opera perhaps than in any of his other works, though the later ones developed him in more heroic, titanic moods. There is real beauty, poetic beauty, in the story itself; one could almost say beauty for beauty's sake, in the combination of romance, mystery and an unnamable Teutonic efflorescence steeping the fate of Elsa in a power all its own. Wagner's genius in giving a frame for a poetry of sentiment to be expressed more in the whole than in parts have found as great an occasion as in the "Flying Dutchman."

So great is the color laid in through the orchestration, and so intensely does it follow the emotional trend of the incidents as they spring into the plot, that the work of acting and vociferating is made easy, so easy that singing is not in question at all. As far as the acting itself in a Wagner opera is concerned, it requires no particularly subtle talent to compass the ends desired. Given the temperament which can excite itself to frenzy at any instant and sustain that poise indefinitely, and the Wagner actor is declared. No special grace, no delicate play or originality of gesture is indispensable. The gestures must come in rhythm, the facial play must be simple and sustained, so that the emotions depicted in the orchestration be pointed at with sufficiently broad finger posts, so to speak; that is all that is needed. Dominated, supported by and developed in orchestral color the actors have little to do besides making themselves heard—and there is where the aid of an indiarated throat and a fine physique is not to be done without. Rossini is said to have declared that three things, voice, and voice and voice, made a singer; endurance, and endurance and endurance make a Wagner actor.

From the rise of the curtain on the first act to the fall at the finale on Monday night there was not an accidental tone of the human voice heard that might have, by the greatest clemency, been admitted to be respectable singing. This does not take away from the undeniable fact that the performance was an excellent one dramatically and aroused deserved enthusiasm. All the principals carried their roles with the necessary frenzy and the utmost they were capable of. Mr. Hinrichs directed with intimate skill, and made possible so strong a performance. Still there was no singing fitted to give pleasure to an impartial or instructed ear. Neither skill nor style made themselves heard. Purity of tone or intonation—ease, grace or volume—all were absent, being replaced by shrieks, howls, contortoine, flatting and sharpening, and all the seven deadly sins, vocal. Still, the performance was a success! A success because the performers had enthusiasm, emotion, intelligence and endurance enough to go the round, led by the dramatic exigencies and the orchestral leadings.

Formerly there were no Wagner performers; nowadays there are none but Wagner performances in opera. The race of singers is dead—dead because the public has lost the sense of beauty in tone and only wants emotion and endurance. Italy, the land of song, has ceased to produce real singers, the art of bel canto is lost. A few phenomenal singers hold high rank by reason of their gifts, not their art. All this may be traced to the love of strong sensations which has pervaded all life and all the arts. The desire for beauty is less than the hunger for novelty and sensationalism. Those who have the love of simplicity and grandeur will find no exemplification of those qualities in the shouting and howling doing duty for singing in modern opera. Modern opera is Wagner opera. Every composer, no matter what his talent, composes a la Wagner—he may feel himself a manikin, yet he is compelled to take up the battle-ax and sword of the Wagner method and exploit the musical concepts of vibrationum symbolien and the rest of the tendencies so wonderfully subscribed to by Wagner. The fields of humor, grace and human sympathy have been deserted, especially humor, for the Wagner opera elides that element. To a great genius of the transcendental kind the ludicrous does not appear to exist, and hence those mannerisms bordering so dangerously near humor.

This rise of the emotional school will run its course probably, and a return to the simple, the classic, in a new form bring with it a revived great school of singing—but that return is not even on the horizon—hence it is a matter of necessity to accept the decadence of song, as a matter of course, and take the extremes of physical endurance and emotional agonies as the best to be had of the art to-day. LESLEY MARTIN.

The woman's jubilee dinner, or soiree, given by one hundred distinguished English women to one hundred distinguished men, was one of the most remarkable gatherings of interesting people they have had in London. It took place in the Grafton Gallery and was quite the talk of the metropolis. It is true that the distinction of some of the men was as inconspicuons as the prominence of certain of the women, but on the whole there were scores of celebrated people and a curious mixture of casts and creeds. Just what constitutes a celebrated man some of the women seemed undecided about, and invited their husbands. Sarah Grand brought her publisher, Mr. Heinemann. Literature was represented by Thomas Hardy, Andrew Lang and Dr. Garnett. Mr. Buckle, of the "Times," Mr. Massingham, of the "Daily Chronicle,' and Dr. Roberston Nicolls represented journalism. Each lady had but one invitation, and it is not extraordinary that certain prominent men found themselves the recipients of half a dozen or more cards. This left quite a number of ladies without partners, though they consoled themselves, as usual, with other ladies' spouses. The event of the evening was Lady Somerset's speech, which was really very clever. The only male who was allowed to air opinions was the Bishop of London, who showed his appreciation of the appropriate by telling an American funny story.

THE HEROINE CROP

Physical Characteristics of Leading Ladies in the Latest Novels.

The heroine of a novel is quite often the feature of the tale, and as a rule is a being of much beauty. If she is not so in the ordinary sense, the novelist endows her with a [illegible] "something," an innate charm, a half concealed grace, that forces itself or takes an unconscious hold upon the observer. Her nose may turn up, her mouth may be large, she may have freckles, but she still possesses the said indefinable something—the secret charm—and she fascinates. In the Trojan days Paris had rather an embarrassing moment with his three goddesses, but were he a nineteenth century novel-reader, and called upon to give the golden prize to the greatest beauty in up-to-date literature he might well shrink in dismay from the order. It is proper, of course, for a novelist to make much of his leading lady. He must descant upon the color of her hair and of her eyes, the playful smiles that come and go, the long, lithe form, the liquid cadence of her voice. He must see to it, also, she is interesting, especially when the hero sees her first, whether sitting on a stile in a gown of some soft, loose stuff, her hair tumbled carelessly and her wide-brimmed hat in her lap, or walking in a shady lane a far-off look in her eyes, or "ensconced" in a recessed window deep in a tale of bygone days. On reflection, however, the thoroughly smart heroine doesn't sit on stiles, nor does she walk in shady lanes with far-off looks in her eyes, nor does she take herself to recessed windows. She has no time for such frivolities; her days are passed in ideas and in aims—sometimes she is a dabbler in esoterics, sometimes a devotee of Buddha, and in a recent book she was actually a pirate, but whatever the provocation or her physical condition she wins hearts, especially the heart of the hero.

It would be out of the question to expect the heroine of Henry James' "Spoils of Poynton" (Houghton-Mifflins) to be a beauty. She is slim, pale and black-haired, and less likely than any of her friends or sisters to "occasion an exchange of platitudes." But she has her fascination—a sense of the exquisiteness of things of an extraordinary "flair" which captivates the hero's mother. Unfortunately, the man of the book requires another type—Miss Brigstock—who is "tall, straight and fair, long-limbed and strangely festooned, without a look in her eyes, or any perceptible intention of any sort in any other feature." She is married, but Fleda, who could appreciate the Spoils of Poynton, is not. Rather a relief after this, very modest heroine to turn to Miss Susan Romer in "The Touchstone of Life" (Stokes). Fleda gets from Henry James about ten lines of description, while Susan has the good fortune to be given just thirty-nine. We meet Susan while at work on a little clay bust which she pauses now and then to examine through a pair of pincenez which dangles from a gold chain round her neck. She is neither tall nor slender, but rather round than slim; her limbs are well-proportioned, and her head is particularly well set upon her shoulders. Her gait is easy and rapid, neither slouching nor undignified—this on the assurance of the author, for so far Susan has been sitting. Her eyes are very dark brown, eyelashes long and dark, complexion clear, with a faint touch of pink, which in periods of excitement and emotion deepens into rose. Her mouth is refined but firm, the underlip slightly "sucked in"—altogether her profile comes close to actual beauty. From all of which it may be gathered that Susan is pretty. No indefinable charm nor concealed grace is required in her case. Nature has been generous.

Mary Wilkins makes Lucina Merritt in "Jerome" a dainty figure. Lucina is a rich man's daughter and dresses the part. She wears a silken gown of pale blue spangled with roses. Her fair hair falls in curls below her waist, every curl for all the world like a twining finger of love. Her bonnet is of fine straw, and through her veil of rich, white lace her pink cheeks and lips, her great blue eyes and locks of golden hair shine and bloom and dazzle like "a rose through a frosted window." Here is a maid as fair as a morning in May, as fragrant as a rose in June, a delight to the soul, compared to which the Venus of Medici and her cousin of Milo are as two brazen images. She is of the gentle, retiring type, very different from Mademoiselle Sibylle Berpac in Conan Doyle's "Uncle Bernac" (Appleton's). This is a young woman of many accentuated emotions—tall and slender, with a dark face, pronounced features and eyes of extraordinary brilliancy. They are black, these eyes, and Mlle. Sibylle uses them very often to express the aforementioned emotions; for instance, the secret brooding of years, the bitter resentments crushed down in her silent soul, the recklessness of passion roused by an unnatural father; all this flushes her dark cheeks and then gleams in her splendid eyes. There is but one man in the world for Mademoiselle Sibylle, but he proves recreant. She may yet have Brigadier Etienne Gerard, but that will be in another story. He will have no eyes for other ladies, however, if they are ever wedded.

The final definitive edition of Francis Parkman's complete works is now in course of publication, ful information of which can be had of the agent, D. P. Elder, Mills Building. It is interesting to note that all of Parkman's works form one great history of the struggle between France and England for supremacy in North America. They are the result of a lifetime of research, Parkman having planned the work when but a youth at college, and concluded the final volume only just before his death.

There are two types of beauty in "The Grey Lady" (Macmillan's)—one of them characterizes Eve, a maid of Majorca, though born of English parents. Her hair is dark and thick and rich, and hangs in a great plait down her back. She is tall and upright, is garbed invariably in black; her skin is wonderfully clear white, touched slightly by the sun; she carries her head with easy Spanish grace, and in her glinting eyes glow changing lights of soulful thought and mild vivacity. So much for Eve—now for the other. Her name is Agatha, and we find her first in a deep chair near the fire; she turns her head and rises with a smile and grace of manner that have apparently been put on with her evening gown, which, by the way, fits very well. Agatha is small and upright; her head is carried with a "peculiar confidence' and is covered with a well-dressed quantity of lightish hair. Her eyes are a dark shade of ashen gray; her mouth is mobile, her lips thin, with some expression down in the left-hand corner. In fact, most of Agatha's facial expression comes from this corner. Her neck and arms are very white, and she is well aware of this, and has given her modiste directions accordingly. It will be observed that Agatha is rather fetching—the white arms, the admirably fitted gown, the well-kept hair—but it is probable she thinks more of Agatha than she is likely to of anyone else, which is rather selfish.

One might advert to Gloria Quayle, who divides Hall Caine's "Christian" with Rev. John Storm. She is a slightly maid—in her youth a tomboy, but with red hair and a buoyant disposition. Quite one of the prettiest of latter-day heroines is Miss Darthea Penniston in "Hugh Wynne," but we are told she had not a perfect feature, though her smile was so variously eloquent that no man saw it unmoved. "Her face had some of that charm of mystery which few women possess—a questioning look." This latter charm is said to exhaust itself in the earlier stages of matrimony. Subsequently it becomes an inquisitorial air. There is also Anne Bruce of "The Kentuckians," in "Harper's," whose physical presentment has not yet been set forth. The superb young patrician who so lords it over Clay in "Soldiers of Fortune," Miss Langham, is really only a translated Gibson girl, and her good looks are as familiar as "Life." One might describe dozens of other young ladies without aiding in deciding on a particular type which might be called—the modern heroine. As I have said, they possess beauty in common—or charm—but otherwise they are as various in their manifestations as humanity itself. Gloria Quayle is athletic—the others are not—but are highly feminine young people who would in cases of necessity call in the assistance of a man rather than depend on themselves.

MILLARD'S TALES

Pungent Episodes of Western Life, Short and Pointed.

Mr. F. B. Millard of the San Francisco "Examiner" is out with a collection of stories—some fifteen of them—which the Eskdale Press publishes under the general title of "A Prety Bandit." In telling his yarns Mr. Millard has adopted the method employed by the latest successful short-story men. This is not to tell a story, but to strike off an incident or two clean-cut, sharp, decisive, and brief, suggesting everything that is to follow and everything that precedes. The method is admirable, but it demands an originality and ingenuity on the part of the author that is little short of abnormal. The "motif" of the story must be very strong, very unusual, and tremendously suggestive. More than this, it must be told in sentences that are almost pictures in themselves. The whole tale must resemble, as one might say, the film of a kinetoscope, a single action made up from a multitude of view points. In choosing this method Mr. Millard has volunteered to enlist in the army of the strongest story-writers the world 'round, and some of his stories are quite good enough to bring him well up in the front ranks, notably the "Caliente Trail," "A Notch in a Principality" (our thinking the best story of the book), "The Girl Reporter," and "Horse-In-The-Water." It is a dodge of publishers, as everyone knows, to put the two best stories at the beginning and end of such a collection. But there is little in "A Pretty Bandit" and "The Making of Her" to commend them. Mr. Millard crystallizes a most startling experience in each of these tales, but somehow fails to convince the reader of its "probability"; as, for instance, the hold-up in the first-named story. That a girl should stand up a stage is extraordinary enough for the most sensation-loving reader, but that she should do so upon the impulse of the moment is quite beyond belief—even worse, it is inartistic. In "The Making of Her" (which came very near being the marring of her) Mr. Millard has evidently striven for a contrast of types, the Boston blue-stocking and the Western cowboy. The contrast is sharp enough, but the "events" narrated are not plausible. They all could have happened, it is true, but in story-telling the question is "might" they have happened. One can forgive the impossible, never the improbable. As a whole, however, the tales make capital good reading. Mr. Millard wastes no time—his own nor his readers—in getting down at once to the heart of his work. There is a plainness, a directness in his style that is "the easy reading and hard writing" one has heard so much about. The author has confined himself to California material, which is always good policy, and at the same time impresses his readers with the fact that he is thoroughly posted upon whatever subject is under consideration for the moment, whether it be railroad life, newspaper life, camp life, or ranch life. ("A Pretty Bandit," F. B. Millard. The Eskdale Press, New York.)

BOOK NOTES

Two other late numbers of the "Town and Country Library" are "Marietta's Marriage," by W. E. Norris, and "Dear Faustina," by Rhoda Broughton. Both these novels resemble one another, inasmuch as there is nothing startling nor especially brilliant about either one. But they both make good reading. Mr. Norris' in particular. Marietta is a curious type of a girl and her marriage was one of convenience rather than of love. But it ends well, at least with good prospects for Marietta's happiness, so the reader should be satisfied. From Miss Broughton's new book one does not miss the characteristics that have made its predecessors so interesting. Faustina's name was Bateson, but she couldn't help that, and probably wouldn't if she could, for she was given to causes and to cults and to the rectifying of social evils in general. The book is a sort of satire on the work of so-called reformers.

If Cuba is as badly off as Stephen Bonsal says she is in his book, "The Real Condition of Cuba To-Day" (Harper and Brothers), then Cuba is badly off, indeed. Mr. Bonsal was special correspondent of the New York "Herald" in Cuba, and may reasonably be supposed to know something of his subject. But notwithstanding this reasonable supposition, it is difficult to believe even upon the authority of the "Herald's" correspondent that things are so bloody in the Pearl of the Antilles. Like other American journalists in Cuba, Mr. Bonsal was strongly in favor of the natives' struggle, and in his book gives it first consideration and the benefit of every doubt as well, and if some people will not accept Mr. Bonsal's statements as literal truth, the most obvious deduction is that there must be a terrible amount of wrong there to call forth such denunciation as we find in his pages.

A book made timely by the recent jubilee is the "Private Life of the Queen," by a member of the royal household (D. Appleton & Co.) An idea of the work may be found in the introduction. In the words of the author, it is "merely a family portrait of a dear old lady who, were she the chatelaine of a country house, or the school mistress of a primitive village, would be admired and beloved by her neighbors in the parish for her wisdom and good works, and by her family and servants as a good mother and mistress." With this amiable and loyal idea the writer develops a full length portrait of Her Majesty, describing especially her private life and stating very plainly what she eats and what she drinks, what she reads and what she writes, and so on until there is very little or practically nothing concerning her that is left unnoticed.

A new story by Ella Mac Mahon is just out from the press of the Frederick A. Stokes and the ending—it is the very touchstone of Life," and is daintily dressed in a binding of silver and green. Like many other tales of the time its theme is love; there are other incidentals and phases leading to, and also from, the sighing passion, but love is the thing; it is the beginning, the continuance, and the ending—it is the evry touchstone of existence. Miss Mac Mahon realizes the importance of love and works it for all it is worth—she makes the young people love each other with passionate intensity—and she makes them suffer with corresponding energy. But as all things end well, and as there is every prospect for the two living happy ever after, "The Touchstone of Life" may be set down as a good thing. It also possesses the additional advantage of some clever illustrations.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube gets inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever. Nine cases out of ten are caused by catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give one hundred dollars for any case of deafness (caused by catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

OPINIONS OF JUSTIN STURGIS

BY LEANDER

'Drinketh a Toast to the Coming of Better Things.

One day last week I went out to the park, early, before anyone else was there, and rowed a bit on Stow Lake. Thereafter, being very hungry, I sought out the Japanese tea garden in the clump of trees not far from the museum. It's really delightful in this quaint, quiet, little tea garden early in the morning, and the beverage is of the very best. I fancied that a cup of very strong, hot tea, with crisp little Japanese cakes, would not be at all amiss. But as I came into the garden who should I find sipping his tea, smoking his morning cigar and flirting the papers of a novel but my friend Justin Sturgis.

"Well," said he, as I dropped down beside him, "where do you come from?"

"Oh," replied I, "from going to and fro upon the earth and walking up and down in it."

"What a devil of a fellow you must be, Leander."

"I'm seeking what I may devour, if you persist in being Biblical," said I, and I ordered tea and cakes.

I was feeding my cakes to the carp and goldfish, when I noticed that Just' was looking at me gravely and shaking his head.

"Leander," says he, "it don't pay to have opinions."

"Pooh!" I answered. "Doctors and lawyers get rich on theirs."

"Yes, but their opinions are asked for; yours are not."

"Mine ought to be the more welcome, then. You must pay a lawyer for his opinions. I give mine away free, even put a chromo-lithograph in every package."

"The people you have opinions about don't like you any better though—drop 'em out, Leander. Just send 'em the chromo."

'What, now—what makes you talk like this?"

"People—girls—answer you through the medium of the press.'

"Have you been getting any more letters?" said I, uneasily.

"Yes," said he, "and worse; we have been parodied. Listen, my child, and you shall hear," he quoted, unfolding a paper. "Listen, and see what you have brought upon yourself."

This is what Just' read:

THE OPINIONS OF CASSANDRA

"Last night I dropped into the C. E. meeting. I am not an active member, but a girl of my spirit naturally likes to see life. I settled myself in a chair, and pulling out a package of tutti-frutti I proceeded to make myself comfortable. I was dropping into a reverie when a rustle of silk skirts caused me to look up. "What,' said I, "you here, of all places, Cassandra?"

Cassandra grinned.

"Heigh-ho," says she. "I have just been to the Orpheum with Leander. "You know Leander, don't you?"

"Yes," said I, looking deep; "miserable little snob!"

Cassandra looked hurt. "He has always been very nice to me. What have you got against him?"

"Well, I have enough against him. The other night he called on me, and you know he's awfully struck on me, and, besides, he's awfully bashful. Well, we sat on the sofa, and the first thing I knew the light went out."

"Didn't pay your gas bill," grinned Cassandra.

"And—well—well, he kissed me."

"Phyllis!" gasped Cassandra.

"Course I was awfully cut up, not being used to that sort of thing, but I knew he was too bashful to speak, so I considered it as good as an engagement."

"Well," said Cass.

"The next day he wrote it up in 'The Surf,' saying I led him on. Did you ever hear anything so dreadful?"

"O, I don't know. We had a fine time at the Orpheum, and I like him. If—"

But here the Endeavorers commenced the closing hymn and Cass and I left.

"Now," said Just', looking up from the paper, "what do you think of that?"

I confess I was staggered, but I began to protest feebly.

"I didn't give that girl cause to think I was bashful, did I, and I'm not 'struck on her' as she says, and she's not 'struck' on me. If we'd been 'struck on' each other it would have been all right."

"Well, then, she's not 'struck on' you as you say. What were her words, 'miserable little snob?' "

I crossed a leg uneasily. "Let's talk of something else."

"As you please," said Just', "and to begin with,or to end with (for I don't think we shall talk together much after to-day), you, Leander, who have been carrying on so about the vagaries of the San Francisco girls—"

"And the men, too."

"And the men, too, have pointed out the evil, but can't you suggest also the remedy?"

"Heaven and earth," I gasped, "because certain things go wrong according to my notion why should I, of all people, be expected to set them right?"

"At least let us defend our opinions. If we are to give them away, let's send 'em well wrapped up and protected from breakage and weather."

"Well," replied I, "it isn't necessary to tell a girl not to smoke cigarettes nor drink cocktails, is it?"

"Might tell 'em what the men think of it."

"Humph, they'd say they didn't do it to please the men."

"Then they must do it because they have a taste for tobacco and alcohol—"

"Horrors!"

"Which is much worse."

"The men think they are little fools."

"And say so to each other."

"And about the girls that allow themselves to be kissed by men whom they are not 'struck on' and who are not 'struck on' them, and permit the 'little familiarities' we were talking about?"

"The men think they are mighty cheap."

"And say so to each other."

"But aren't there some men who kiss and don't tell?"

"That's what some girls think," said I. "But when a man can kiss a girl easily, it's the nature of the beast to let other men know about it."

"I guess yes," said Just', scratching his head. "You see it stands to reason that if a girl don't mind being kissed she doesn't mind having it known. If you win a girl easy you can't respect her very much. You'd just as soon talk about her. And if you don't say right out that the next man can kiss her, you say, 'Hoh! yes, So-and-so, you can have a good time with her.' "

"Sounds fine, don't it,' said I. "The girls ought to hear, but how about the young fellows who come to functions drunk and dance with the girls?"

"The girl is to blame for that. She ought to refuse to dance with a man when he's that way—call him down so hard that it will almost sober him, or, better still, tell some other man about it—some other man who is 'struck on' her."

"Would the other man punch his head?"

"He ought to. "Suppose it was the girl you know—the one particular girl. For instance, Miss ——"

"We won't discuss 'that girl'," I interrupted, glaring at him fiercely.

"That's so, and that makes me think. The men have got something to learn, too."

"For instance."

"Well, for one thing, never to talk of a good, straight girl among themselves; say nothing about her, good, bad or indifferent. You know yourself how it cheapens a girl to have her talked about in a club, or anywhere, when men get together. I've heard it done in a barroom, even, and I know a man who used to telephone to a girl from the Deception saloon."

"Beast!"

"No. This man didn't think, I guess. Maybe that's the trouble with most of 'em. A little more convention, that's what we all need—nothing stiff or formal or false or prudish. I hate it as bad as any of them, but in Heaven's name let's have some girls who don't let every man that's known 'em a month sit with them in the dark and kiss 'em when he likes, and let's have—or, rather, let's say we've got to have, in the name of ordinary decency, men who will not come to functions drunk or get intoxicated where nice girls are around."

"Surely it's little enough to ask."

"Is this our last talk?"

"Guess yes."

"Then here's to a better state of things next season."

We raised our cups.

"Tea and toast," sa I.

"It's mildly appropriate to drink that toast in tea" answered Just'. "Here's to conventionalities in moderation."

"Amen and Amen," said I.

And we drank—standing up.

TURF TOPICS

Futurity Notes — Oakland and Ingleside Programmes Next Season.

The trotting circuit meetings seem to be progressing satisfactorily. This week harness racing has been going on at Chico and next week will follow on at Willows.

The State Fair, which will extend over two weeks only instead of three as last year, will commence on September 6th, the racing programme being a mixed one of running and trotting events. Judged by the list of entries that has been published both sections should produce interesting contests. In the 2-year-old stakes, of which there are four catalogued, the entries are numerous and include many youngsters that have not yet faced the starter.

The autumn meeting of the Coney Island Jockey Club begins at Sheepshead Bay next Monday, on which day the Futurity, the most valuable racing fixture in America, will be run. According to latest advices the field is likely to be made up from the following: Rey El Salto, Great Bend, Plaudit, Grand Sachem, Briar Sweet, Previous, Murillo, Frohman, Momentum, Demagogue, Uriel, Cock Robin, Benares, Howland, Gala Day, Central Twist, Arquebus, The Huguenot, Gibraltar and Her Majesty. Of these Rel El Salto (Emperor of Norfolk—Jennie D.), the property of Mr. E. J. Baldwin, is the only youngster that has run in California. Though a very fair colt, in the spring he did not impress one as of the first rank, but as he proved himself to be possessed of speed and gameness, he may give a good account of himself, provided he has done well since going East. His owner's stable has been in good form lately and often has proverbial luck. The Burns & Waterhouse filly, Recreation, at one time a promising candidate for Futurity honors, no longer appears as a probable starter. The Eastern talent favor Howland in Mr. J. E. Madden's stable. Mr. Marcus Daly's Grand Sachem, a son of Tammany, went East from Montana with a high character. The same owner's Briar Sweet is a California-bred filly.

Both the two and three-year-old form in the East seems to be getting more open as the season wanes, though Hamburg and Ornament, respectively, are the champions of their age. If Howland, in the same stable as the former, should win the Futurity he may then achieve the position which his owner claims for him, namely, that he is the better of the two; but, in the meantime, on public form, Hamburg is the two-year-old of the year.

The complete list of stakes for the Fall, Winter and Spring Meetings, 1897-98, at the Oakland track has now been published by the California Jockey Club, showing a total of $53,600 divided amongst thirty-six events. Of these there are twenty stakes, with a guaranteed value of $1,000 to $15,000, to twelve of which entrance is free, which will close on September 20. Then there are ten events, including the Burns Handicap, one and one-quarter miles, for all ages, $10,000; the Thornton Stake, four mile, for three-year-olds and upward, $3,000, and other smaller prizes not less than $1,250 each, which will close on November 10, full conditions to be published hereafter; and also six stakes guaranteed at $1,000 to $1,500 each for foals of 1896, to close in January, 1898, full conditions and exact date of closing yet to be specified.

The opening day at Oakland is appointed for November 15.

The Pacific Coast Jockey Club have yet to publish their programme for the Ingleside meetings. It is the intention of the club, however, at least to repeat their liberality of last season, and as they then provided prizes a few thousand dollars more in the aggregate than the Oakland track offered, a good estimate of their intentions can be formed. The Ingleside list of stakes is to be completed very shortly.

Racing seems to have taken on a new lease of life at Chicago, and the class of horses at the Harlem track is said to be steadily improving. It is expected that the ball will be kept rolling in the metropolis of the Middle West until November 1st.

There has been formed in Montana the Butte Horseman's Association, with a capital of $150,000, Mr. E. A. Tipton, the head and front of the present racing schemes in that part of the country, being the chief incorporator. It is evident that the meetings of the last and present year have led up to this result, and that henceforward regular fixtures may be looked for in the mining section.

A while ago there was a rumor of a match being likely between the Derby winner of 1896 and 1897, but it is now hardly looked for, as neither of the owners would care to see his horse beaten, which would be an obvious necessity, unless they should happen to run a dead heat. The odds would probably be in favor of Galtee More, though to take a line through Velasquez, who has met both him and Persimmon, this season, is not exactly a safe proceeding. It has been argued that Velasquez made a better showing against Persimmon in the Eclipse than he did against Galtee More in the Derby, but Velasquez was admittedly off at the time the Derby was run, whereas when he went to the post for the Eclipse he was said to be in fine order, and moreover Persimmon had only just previously undergone a strong preparation for the long distance Ascot Cup, which must have taken the edge off his speed to a degree that would prejudice his performance on a shorter course like the Eclipse.

The death is reported of George Frederick, winner of the Derby in 1874. As a studhorse he sired five or six fair animals, of which the French-bred Frontin was perhaps the best.

The following story has appeared in a leading English sporting paper and has a moral for racing men everywhere: After Curzon had run second for the Derby, Tom Cannon sold him for a large sum to Baron Hirsch, with the contingency of £500 more the first time he won. The horse subsequently proved almost worthless, and on the death of the Baron was sold for a small sum. After a lapse of over two years, he a short time ago won a little selling race, and was then disposed of for 115 guineas. Tom Cannon at once swooped down on the estate of Baron Hirsch for the £500—and got it!

Western breeders should note that the hackney is in good demand, both in Europe and the East, and probably there will ere long be some important renewals of the best strains amongst breeders on the Atlantic side, as there are several commissions in the hands of English buyers to select good stallions and mares for shipment to this country.

BENEDICT.

DRAMATIC NOTES

Herr Carl Walther, the Belgian violinist, is announced for three recitals in Golden Gate Hall, September 9th, 10th and 11th. Herr Walther is said to be a very clever violinist, and possesses quite an Eastern and European reputation.

"The Heart of Maryland" has made a great success at the Baldwin, having been received with even more favor than was anticipated. The audiences have been unusually large and promise to continue so, the sale of seats already extending into the second and third weeks of the engagement.

Miss Anna Miller Wood will give a song recital at the First Unitarian Church Saturday afternoon, September 4th. The affair is announced by the Channing Auxiliary Society, and being Miss Wood's first appearance since her return from Europe it should attract musicians in general.

The next "Musical Evening" at Byron Mauzy's Hall, on Post street, will come off Thursday evening, August 26th. The programme will be given by the most promising pupils of Mr. James Hamilton Howe and Mr. Bernard Mollenhaeur. Mr. Mauzy has arranged a series of classical concerts to take place at his hall during the fall and winter.

The play at Morosco's next week, "The Train Wreckers," is founded upon the Great Eastern and Occidental Railroad strike, and in the unraveling a number of sensational effects are introduced, including a full-sized train of cars and the blowing up of a bridge in order to wreck the aforementioned train. In the cast is Oliver Paul, a comedian who has been specially engaged.

The Orpheum has a great musical attraction for next week, the "Knaben-Kapelle," a Hungarian boys military band of forty pieces. The Kapelle is said to be one of the greatest novelties ever brought to this country. The new people to open are Smith and Campbell, talking comedians; John C. Fox and Katie Allen, sketch artists, and Mazuz and Mazet, the tramp and the brakeman.

Augustin Daly's comedy, "The Great Unknown," will be revived at the Columbia Monday evening. The piece will be cast very much as on its previous production. Frank Worthing, Harry Corson Clarke and Blanche Bates playing their old parts, the only changes being the appearance of Francis Carlyle and Gladys Wallis in the roles formerly taken by Wilton Lackaye and Hope Ross.

"Jane" is filling out the week at the Alcazar, its first performance in this city at popular prices. The clever little comedy is given well, the cast including the best members of the company. An addition thereto is Miss Christine Hill, a character actress of some repute. She has been with a number of good Eastern companies, and was last in this city with "Mme. Sans Gene." "Jane" will run all next week and will be followed by "The Highest Bidder," "Too Much Johnson" and "The Girl I Left Behind Me."

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

Mike Kelly, the famous baseball pitcher, had a hot temper, but also a sense of humor. During the game at Brotherhood Park, when the Bostons were playing the New Yorks, Kelly got angry at a series of adverse decisions, and, throwing the ball over the grandstand, walked down the field, towards the dressing-rooms. He was going to quit. Just as he reached the outfield, however, Jim O'Rourke met him. "Mike, my dear boy," said Jim, "think what you are doing. Pray do not evacuate in this preposterous manner. Remember the Brotherhood and its eccentric relations for which we are fighting. Remember the superannuated, conglomerated, heterogeneous, multitudinous—" "That'll do!" interrupted Kelly. "I'll bet you can't spell it. But I'll go back and play!" And he did.

The late M. Challamel Lacour was noted for his exquisite tact. Accredited as Embassador of France to the Swiss Confederation, on arrival at Berne he called formally on the President. His Excellency was in the cellar bottling wine, but the Ambassador was invited to wait. M. Challamel Lacour entered hanging up his coat in the hall. A few minutes later, the President entered: "An ugly job, monsieur!" drying his hands; "an ugly job! But I always bottle my own wine. Pardon my coat, also. It is a poor fit," glancing down. "It is my son's, to tell the truth. I hurried it on without looking at it." The Ambassador bowed and smiled. It was his own coat. The intervnew being over, he went home shivering. He sent a messenger the next day for his "coat, which he had hung up in the hall."

The Duke of Sutherland presented a park to one of the pottery towns. The opening was a big event, and the Prince of Wales was asked to perform the ceremony. A deputation waited on the Prince, headed by a wealthy and worthy magistrate, noted less for court-like demeanor than for being large-hearted, rough and ready and "real Staffordshire." Unfortunately the Prince was unable to comply. "I should have been most happy," said he, "had I known sooner." "Canna tha spare half a day just to show thy face?" said the magistrate. "We shall look fules when we get back." But the Prince was inexorable. Much disconcerted, the deputation seemed at a loss as to how to proceed. Suddenly an idea struck their resourceful leader, and, turning to the heir-apparent, he said: "Well, if tha canna come, send thy mother!"

Professor Gallaudet, of the Deaf Mute Institute in Washington, has a clever pupil, a little boy, who, in spite of his deformity, is well informed about George Washington. Senator Hoar visited the Institute one day and the boy was called on to tell the story of the cherry tree, which he did with quick moving fingers. He arrived at the point at which George's father finds the injury, and he continued: "When George's father asked him who hacked his favorite cherry tree, George put his hatchet in his left hand—" "Stop," interrupted the professor. "Where did you get your authority for saying he took the hatchet in his left hand?" "Why," responded the boy, "he needed his right hand to tell his father that he cut the tree."

The English Treasury Department sent an official to Dublin once to protest against the extravagance of the late Lord Chief Justice Fitzgerald, in whose court more coal was burned than in any other courtroom in the kingdom. His lordship received the man, and listened gravely, and formally while he explained his errand and enlarged upon the importance of economy in the matter of fuel. When he had finished Lord Fitzgerald rang the bell, and, when the servant appeared, said: "Tell Mary that the man has come about the coals."

A Bangor drummer recently saw a woman enter the train at North Bucksport and rush through the car just as it was getting speedy. He coolly walked after her, and just before the fatal leap, grasped her firmly to his manly bosom. She struggled, but she only tightened his grip, saying: "Madam, you shan't jump off the car and kill yourself!" When she got her breath she shrieked: "You big fool, I was only going out on the platform to wave my handkerchief to my friends."

A stenographer once proposed to Henry Ward Beecher that he should be allowed extra pay for reporting Mr. Beecher's sermon, in consideration of correcting the errors in grammar. "How may errors," asked the great preacher, "did you find in this discourse of mine?" "There were 216," was the reporter's reply. "Young man," said Mr. Beecher solemnly, "when the English language gets in my way, it doesn't stand half a chance!"

A golfer in South Africa left his property to be equally divided between two sons. Not being able to agree they decided to let President Krueger arbitrate. He said to the eldest, "You are the eldest, are you not?" "Yes," was the answer. "So you shall divide the property." This pleased the elder immensely. "You are the younger," continued Krueger to the other, "so you shall have first choice."

Frederick Locker Lampson told a story of Bedford, the great English bookbinder, which illustrates clearly the nature of the collector. "He once sent me home a little book which I considered unsatisfactory. The volume did not shut properly. It gaped. When I pointed out this grievous defect to Bedford, his only remark was, 'Why, bless me, sir, you've been reading it!' "

The Eleventh Hussars had arrived in Dublin one day, and, after a levee at the Castle, one of their officers, walking down Sackville street in full dress, met two Irishmen fresh from the country. Quite staggered by the glittering and gorgeous apparition, one of the Irishmen said to the other, "Begorra, but shouldn't I like to pawn him!"

THE PROTESTS OF DEBS.

Labor's latest message to the public comes from the mouth of Debs, and it is unpatriotic enough, fiery enough, and treasonable enough, to suit the most malignant enemy of American institutions ever bred within or without our borders. He suggests revolution, hints at an armed uprising of Labor, and damns the country roundly, besides. As an expression of the fine spirit that dominated the convention which Mr. Debs addressed amid such wild enthusaism, a set of resolutions was adopted, every line of which breathes a threat against the peace and welfare of the country. Section 6 of the pronunciamento reads as follows:

"Resolved, That we most emphatically protest against government by injunction, which plays havoc with even such political liberty as workingmen have saved from the steady encroachment of capitalism."

Every lawyer and every intelligent man knows that no political liberty of the workingman, or, for that matter, of any other man, is threatened by the injunction of our courts. It is well known that the injunction is a writ employed to prevent the attempt or the consummation of acts in themselves illegal—acts that violate or intrude upon the rights of others—acts which, if permitted to continue, would divest some citizen of his rights, destroy his property, or inflict some damage upon him. Labor assumes to believe that it has rights upon which the coal-mine owners of the east are trampling. Perhaps it has. Conceding that it has, neither the law nor the courts nor common justice will permit you or me, or even Labor, to deprive another of his rights, or to take the law into our own hands for the purpose of compelling some one else to concede our claims, however just they may appear in our eyes. It is a primary principle that two wrongs do not make a right, but it seems as though primary principles are not much regarded in these days of novel theories of government.

Labor closes its pronunciamento with this disingenuous declaration:

"Resolved, That no nation in which the people are totally disarmed can long remain a free nation, and, therefore, we urge upon all liberty-loving citizens to remember and obey Article II., of the Constitution of the United States, which reads as follows:

" 'The right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.' "

This pretended quotation from the Constitution is a living, breathing, lusty lie. It was intended to deceive, and will no doubt delude many ignorant men who are sadly unfamiliar with the Constitution. The Article which Labor cites in justification of its right to bear arms, with which to shoot such of mankind as oppose it, reads as follows:

"A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

This article of the Constitution was intended to give governmental sanction and endorsement to the State militia. It was this same State militia at which Mr. Debs, and Labor generally, hurled invectives but a short while ago. It was this same State militia that Labor jeered at, spat at, and grossly and deliberately insulted during the great railway strike. Why did not Labor, when quoting this article, quote it in its entirety? As far back as 1789 our forefathers anticipated armed mobs led by Debses, and they provided for State military organizations that could cope with such disturbers of the peace, quell them, and bring them within the custody of the law. To garble the plain language of the Constitution and set it before the people as granting a license to bands of maurauding malcontents to arm themselves for the purpose of enforcing their extortionate demands, is to lie, willfully, deliberately and intentionally. The forced construction which Labor attempts to put upon the Constitution would, if generally accepted, soon drive Peace into hiding and bring out Strife. It would restore the conditions of ancient feudal days, when knight and retinue swept down upon a neighbor and by force of arms pillaged his castle and stripped his house of plate and his fields of cattle.

It is difficult to say upon what grounds Labor and Capital may meet, but there is some broad ground which will afford a meeting place. The employer of men who is moved by humane spirit of fairness in treating with his employees, can exercise no controlling influence over his wealthy neighbor whose greed and avarice precipitate a strife that forces Labor to resist; yet Labor, ignoring the debt of gratitude it owes to the generous paymaster, compels him to suspend his mine or mill and suffer loss equally with Avarice, until his offending neighbor comes to terms. This is manifestly unfair, but it is the accepted creed of Labor.

The California railway companies, who paid their employees the highest wages paid on earth to men in similar employment, were not exempt from Labor's blows when Mr. Pullman, three thousand miles away, quarreled with his employees. Upon the order of the miserable Debs, the California railway employees quit their employment and fought bitterly with the most generous railway paymaster in the world. Such ingratitude in Labor is as reprehensible as is greed with Capital. It has a tendency, too, that hardens hearts that, naturally, might be kindly. Again, the demands of Labor run to wild and outrageous extremes when once it is aroused to action, and so it accomplishes the defeat of its just claims by resorting to unreasonableness. We have no more sympathy for avarice and greed than have we for the noisy followers of a demagogue like Debs. There is, somewhere in all this wrangling, a place of compromise; a place where fair-minded men may meet on common ground. There is something that will put a curb on inhuman greed ,and effectually snuff out of existence Debs and the kindred devils who live on the afflictions they pretend to cure. The statesman who solves this broad problem will earn the gratitude of the world, and will live in memory so long as men earn by toil the bread which gives them sustenance.

ETHICS OF THE FRESHMAN RUSH.

According to custom there has been another lower class rush over at Berkeley at the opening of the fall term. According to custom a student or two has been manhandled, and according to dear, old time-honored custom the faculty have announced their intention to prohibit rushing altogether in the future. All this nappened last year, and the year before that, and the "announcement of intention" on the part of the faculty, notwithstanding, will happen next year and the year after that. Why not? Of course it is deplorable that the Freshman B. F. Kurtz should have had his face kicked in, and, of course, it is deplorable that F. F. Marshall should now be laid up with a twisted knee. But it would be much more deplorable if young men of the present Sophomore and Freshman classes of the U. C. should have arrived at that age when the law recognizes them as men without knowing what it means to be in a good, stiff, knock-down and drag-out fight. Fighting is a good thing. We Anglo-Saxons are a fighting race; have fought our way from the swamps of Holland to the shores of the Pacific Coast at an expense of worse things than smashed faces and twisted knees. Civilization is far from that time when the fighting man can be dispensed with. The strongest nations of to-day are the fighting nations. Germany, for instance, that "fears only God," and whose students are notorious fighters. Little Japan was never recognized until she fought. The "unspeakable Turks," most detested of people, have won the respect of the world by thrashing Constantine and King George. Fighting is a good thing, and the world has not outgrown it. The hope of a nation is its young men, and what is true of one is true of the other. One good fight will do more for a boy than a year of schooling. If he loses, he has at least had an experience which can be made profitable; if he wins it gives him a self-confidence and a self-reliance that cannot be instilled into him by any amount of encouragement or boosting on the part of his "parents, pastors or masters"; it wakes in him that fine, reckless arrogance, that splendid, brutal, bullying spirit that is the Anglo-Saxon's birthright; that got for us this whole mid-ocean country from under the guns of England; that got Texas and New Mexico and the whole Southwest for us, and California and the northern boundary. The same strong, brutal spirit that re-welded the Union in '64, and that under Lawrence, and Perry, and Hull in 1812 fought England to a standstill on her own element. Wellington said that Waterloo was won on the football fields of Eaton and Rugby, while on the other hand the French, who rear their boys on the "sheltered life" coddling systems, in "Lycees" and private "cours," have never produced a single great soldier since the days of Napoleon, who was a Corsican.

If the boys of our universities want to fight, let them fight, in Heaven's name, and consider it a thing to be thankful for. They are only true to the instincts of their race. In five years they will be old enough to carry a rifle, and who knows how soon the President of the country may want and call for just that fighting spirit that the President of the college condemns. Fight? Of course let them fight. If it be the trained and systematized fighting of "flying wedges" and "tandem plays" so much the better; it is that much nearer the fighting of platoon and brigade. If it is the undisciplined free fighting of the cane rush, and the rough-and-tumble scrimmaging around the backstop, it is at least fighting and will not fail of effect.

This fighting business is better than drinking, and cigarettes, and women; better than "going over to the city and boozing up" on liquors and pousse cafes and such like poisons; better than "doing the line" on Kearny street of a Saturday afternoon; better than a score of the evil, vicious ways in what the Freshman is only too apt to run. If there was more fighting, and rushing, and general promiscuous scrapping over at Berkeley there would be less dissipation. I never heard that the gentle-minded members of the college faculty ever raised a protest about their boys knocking themselves to pices with women and nicotine and alcohol. They shut their eyes to all that, evidently. But it seems to me were I the father of a Freshman, I would rather see him brought home with a smashed face than brought home drunk; would rather watch him limp through life with a twisted knee than know him to be rotten with disease; would prefer a broken rib to a tobacco heart. Let them fight if they want, these reckless young under grads. The life of men in the world is one big "rush" after all, where only the fittest survive and the weakest go to the wall. If the Freshman gets only this knowledge out of a cane rush, and learns that in four years he is to be pitchforked out into a place where only his strength of body and mind is to keep him up with the procession, he will have gained more than he can ever get out of a classroom, or lecture-hall, or text-book.

MISTAKEN LABOR.

Labor is again warring with the laws of nature, the rules of trade, and to its lasting harm and great discredit is again bitterly and malevolently inveighing against the courts and the laws of the most kindly government ever established by human hands. A government whose solicitude is so great for even its meanest citizen who may be caught within the meshes of the law that other nations are moved to sneer at and ridicule it for its forbearance. A government so generous to its subjects that even its own citizens harshly criticise the very safeguards mercifully devised for their own protection. Ingeniously enough, labor, to justify its unlawful adventures in the eyes of honest men, appeals to God and to the Constitution, to freedom and to manhood. Yet with ungovernable and selfish hate this same labor would crush the very life out of every sacred right and privilege held dear to American hearts if they failed to dovetail with the distorted and damnable doctrines of the demagogic labor agitator. Labor invokes for justification of its course the sacred things it would destroy. It prates with noisy insincerity about the Constitution, while it tramples mercilessly upon recognized rights which that great fundamental law has, by its generous provision, made secure to every citizen. It supplicates justice, that it may destroy the rights of others. It beseeches in the name of manhood, that it may be privileged by force of arms and overpowering numbers to strike manhood down. It shrieks for freedom, but what a sad travesty on freedom is that for which it craves. It is freedom to overawe and kill those who work while it quarrels, it is a freedom to burn and destroy the property of the employer who has the manhood to object to its insolent domination. It is the freedom for which the unsatisfied stomach of anarchy yearns hungrily, the freedom that has assassination for its motto, and renders murder a virtue that mothers might teach their offspring brought no dishonor. The hand that points to revolution as the means to remedy the real or fancied wrongs of labor, would not hesitate to apply the incendiary's torch or hurl a murderous bomb if it could do so without detection.

Labor is beating its head against a great natural law—a law as inflexible as those of the Medes and Persians. Natural laws of supply and demand will regulate the price of labor so long as men toil. The skilled craftsman may throttle the threatening over-supply in his special calling by denying the young American admission to his union, and so artificially maintain his wages at the expense of equally deserving citizens, but at best this is but a temporary make-shift. In the toil calling only for brawn no such device is possible. Into the ranks of unskilled labor have gravitated the world's fast multiplying thousands of idle but willing hands, the hands that are by labor unions refused the right to learn a trade, the hands that must work or steal. So great have been the accessions to the ranks of common toil that irresistibly the rewards of such toil have been forced downward. And here lies the cause of labor's present troubles. The burden has not been evenly distributed. Labor demanding special skill and protected by labor unions and national tariff laws, has suffered comparatively little through the glut of the market while among the hewers and drawers of water, grim Want has been no stranger.

As with labor, so with the prices of all products—a glutted market inevitably results in falling values. The American farmer, whose wheat and kindred products but a little while ago were marketable only at prices that meant certain destruction to him, was forced to submit to the operation of the great unwritten but unavoidable law of supply and demand. He might, with quite as profitless zeal and equal justification, have followed the example of labor. It could have been easily demonstrated that consumers were well able to pay higher prices for their wheat and flour than those prevailing then, and with equal plausibility it might have been demonstrated that, in not doing so, the consumers were robbing the farmer of the fruits of his toil. He too might have shouldered his rifle and taken to the highways demanding higher prices for his wheat in the name of Liberty and Independence, and he too might have shot down the man who refused to recognize and submit to his unjust and unusual claims. Debs and kindred demagogues who profit by the calamities of others might have contributed their lungs to this cause as they have to that of labor, but though they shouted themselves for "dollar wheat," their noise would have been as unavailing as hope in hell or reason with a demagogue.

NO AMERICANS NEED APPLY.

In several recent issues of the New York "Mirror" are printed lists of the new English and French plays brought to this country for the season of '97-98. The American dramatist reading these must feel that there is no room for his talents in his own country, and that to live he must direct his brains and energies to the simpler problems of shop-keeping.

Mr. Frohman, of the Lyceum, has pieces of Pinero, Jones, Parker, Hope and Rose, Carton, and Jerome K. Jerome. These are expected to fill the season. Three American plays "are scheduled," as the notice puts it. They are by Grace Furniss, whose book of short pieces for drawing-room acting was a success; George Hibbard, a writer of short stories for the magazines, and Glen McDonough, who already has a reputation as a playwright. But the English will have first show, and we will believe in the domestic trio when we see them on the boards.

Another manager's agent, Samuel French, has just come home with a trunk full of foreign pieces. He has gone to France and England for his wares. He has bought them by the dozen. While Mr. Frohman has first choice with the celebrities, Mr. French follows and picks up the crumbs. His list contains names we know little of on this side of the water. One of his finds is a piece called "No Cross, No Crown," which he says "has had great success in the English provinces." This is its recommendation to a corresponding success in the American West.

The artistic absurdity of casting domestic players in these foreign dramas does not seem to strike anybody. When Daly used German comedies so freely he always had sense enough to adapt them to the native character and environment. But few managers, unfortunately, have the brains of a Daly. One of the most distinctively American society actresses, Maude Adams, is to open her season with Barrie's "Little Minister," in which she plays Bobbie, a Scotch gypsy. How the English and French, who have for years used this country as a dumping ground for their unsalable wares, must laugh at the naive American public, which pays out its dollars for their poor pictures, their sham bric-a-brac, their imitation tapestries and their bad plays!

The most remarkable feature of this importing of foreign dramas is that the domestic dramas when they do get a chance to be seen are so much more successful. The proof of the pudding is in the eating, and that audiences want the native article is proved by the avidity with which they seize upon it whenever they can get it.

What foreign pieces, unless by the very greatest masters, have succeeded in this country as the war plays have from "Shenandoah" to "Heart of Maryland?" Both Mr. Howard and Mr. Belasco have made fortunes in these two pieces, much larger, we would venture to assert, than the royalties received by Mr. Pinero or Mr. Jones on the American performances of their successful works. Have any foreign dramas held the stage in this country as the two great hayseed plays, "The Old Homestead" and "Shore Acres" have? Has any English dramatist had a piece performed as continuously and as successfully in the United States as "Uncle Tom's Cabin" has been, which for half a century has delighted the people and is still given in country towns?

Matinee dramas of locality like "Alabama," and "Pudd'nhead Wilson," and "In Old Kentucky," hold our stage longer than any English rural pieces have ever done. An American melodrama, "The Girl I Left Behind Me," pleased the people more than any imported melodrama, unless, perhaps, "The Silver King," a masterpiece of its kind. Domestic plays of society from "The Banker's Daughter" to "The Charity Ball" hold their own against such importations as "Lady Windermere's Fan" and "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" and "The Case of Rebellious Susan"—all works of master hands.

A few more towns of the West, where fine companies play English pieces to empty benches, and our managers will perhaps realize that for the sake of their purses they must give us domestic plays. Look over the record of the great stock companies seasons in the East last year—the failures that had to be withdrawn, the failures that in despair were forced into runs which might be quoted in the Western advertisements—and one will realize that the time has come when the American gorge has at last risen against the foreign diet it has endured for so many years.

GERALDINE BONNER.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

Though in traveling from East to West the fame of Mr. Gelette Burgess' exploits in Gotham and The Hub has gained disproportionately in size, I learn, nevertheless, that the "'Lark' man" has become a familiar in Eastern literary circles. Mr. Burgess himself is authority for the fact that Copeland and Day are to bring out the "Vivette" papers shortly, and that the bound volume of the "Bird," i. e., "The Lark," is selling strong at the Old Corner Bookstore. Mr. Burgess has met a whole lot of Eastern Somebodies, and has himself become associated with a circle in Boston that calls itself "Les Patrins," after Imogene Quincy's book of essays. Mary Wilkins, it would seem, is the leading spirit of this organization, which appears to be "Les Jeunnes" of Boston. Among other celebrities Mr. Burgess has rubbed elbows with Oliver Hereford, whom he describes as the "Whistler" of the East. Everyone is quoting stories of his eccentricities and his droll remarks. One of his latest, and for a time his favorite joke, was the creation of a club which he called the Faragut. Mr. Hereford was its only member. He would, however, ask certain of his friends to allow him to put them up. The innocent friend would consent with alacrity, and some two weeks later would receive a mournfully worded note from Hereford saying that he had been blackballed. The thing worked very well until it was tried upon a choleric Bishop, who demanded an explanation, and so disclosed the whole scheme. Mr. Burgess has had two stories recently accepted by "Life," one a Christmas story.

Apropos of Miss Tompkins' appointment on the staff of "Munsey's Magazine," a story comes to hand that rather curiously illustrates the character of the editor of that phenomenally successful publication. It is said that Mr. Munsey will have no one on his staff—at least no one of the male persuasion—who has not graduated from Yale University, the inference being that the sons of Eli have distinguished themselves so highly in other fields that they can hardly fail of success in literary work. It remains to be seen how Miss Tompkins, who, I am told, invariably sports the crimson of Harvard, will fit into such an entourage. Munsey often sends his editors abroad in search of material, so we may guess that Miss Tompkins is going to fill a position that may be quite desirable otherwise than financially.

Is it that the editor of the "Argonaut" has discovered that there are other short-story writers in the world besides H. G. Wells that he has begun a republication of "Many Cargoes?" Or, maybe he had exhausted all the brief stories in Wells' volume, and was forced to find new material. "Many Cargoes" ought to save him money for weeks to come. There are some fifteen stories contained in the book, and they are the most humorous yarns I have read in years. Maybe the fact has not met the editor's notice, but really the book has been out three months. This business of deliberately decanting the entire contents of a popular volume into the columns of the "Argonaut" may satisfy the readers of the moribund periodical, but I should think it would prove rather disconcerting to the Frederic A. Stokes Company, who are the publishers of "Many Cargoes," and anticipate selling copies of it in San Francisco.

Journalism has had an excellent topic in the "Examiner-Journal's" big Portland scoop, which ranks as an exceedingly brilliant newspaper achievement. The credit of it is attributable to the energy and foresight of City Editor Thomas Garrett, who planned the campaign which resulted in such a victory for his paper. There has been considerable rivalry for Klondyke news in California, but the excitement is even greater in New York, where all the big dailies are at sword's points. The "Herald" and the "World" had a corner on the Portland's news through some prearrangement with a "Post-Intelligencer" reporter who had gone to St. Michael's and returned on the steamer. It was assumed he would have the news ready to file, giving the syndicate a chance for a "beat." Into this combination the "Journal" was not admitted, and it was thrown on its own resources. The greatest difficulty was experienced in obtaining a tug to meet the steamer, and all sorts of obstacles discovered themselves. At this juncture, as a forlorn hope, Mr. Garrett was sent north to take charge of the situation. He had carte blanche as to arrangements, and was accompanied by a staff of the "Examiner's" best men, who all went to work with a will. The scoop was achieved by using the telephone from Port Angels and the telegraph at Port Townsend, instead of waiting to reach Seattle as the others had done, and, of course, the wires were held with the "Journal" matter, and the result was that they beat their competitors by seven hours into New York and secured a notable triumph. It was all due to generalship and head work, and was the kind of a newspaper victory worth achieving, for all had a clear field.

The "Call" anticipates moving into its new building about the first of October, and in the meantime the new proprietor is developing into a journalist. He has sedulously devoted himself to learning the business details of the enterprise and acquainting himself with his editorial responsibilities. To the office he has gone every night for weeks, and to-day Mr. Spreckels has achieved a familiarity with type styles, the etiquette of the city editor's department and the frames of the stereotyping room. Changes, I am told, are impending which will bring the "Call" again to the front and give it the place it should have in California journalism.

The "Bulletin" has also scored a triumph in news-gathering. The distinction of publishing the first letter from Dawson City belongs to this journal. This was also an instance of foresight and preparation, and was well worth achieving. Mr. Crothers and Mr. Older are accepting congratulations.

If appearances be not deceptive, Mayor Phelan will soon have the appointment of certain solid citizens of | acquaintance as members of a new Board of Supervisors. There seems little doubt but that Judge Wallace will remove the Supervisors on the ground of their failure to fix water rates within the month of February, which both the law and the Constitution provide. This is the pretext, of course, and it is assured by the cognoscenti at the City Hall that everything will happen as indicated. Wallace peremptorily overruled Attorney McEnerney's demurrer, and has denied a separate jury trial to the individual Supervisors. Nor is it likely that any new points can be made in the answer which will now have to be filed. There are several precedents in the books for the attitude assumed, and the judicial spirit is indeed willing to go to the full length of its privileges. The Supreme Court will immediately be appealed to, but now the interesting question arises: Does the statute contemplate immediate removal; or will the appeal act as a stay of proceedings? It is only constructive malfeasance of which the Board is accused, and there is no other penalty than loss of office. Had the charge been criminal, of course it would mean instant dismissal at the Judge's order. But this is virtually a civil case, and it leaves a nice question to be wrought upon by those most concerned. I presume Mayor Phelan will at once proceed to appointment, and then until the Supreme Court is heard from we will doubtless have two Boards. On their respective merits the Auditor will have the opportunity of deciding. One can readily imagine the delightful complications which will ensue in such a predicament. In so far as the participation of the Mayor is concerned, he will, of course, preside at his own Board. It is understood he intends to reappoint Supervisors Clinton, Dodge and Lackmann, who will, of course, sit only among the reorganized. There are comic opera situations in reserve which will help the dailies and provide us all with humor. All this depends on the ability of Judge Wallace to discover grounds for dismissal.

Senator Morgan, of Alabama, who is now on a visit to the Coast, is quite the most garrulous man in the United States Senate and an ideal demagogue. His eloquence is of the ancient Southern type. He soars into the Empyrean, plays along the mountain tops and descends into the abysmal depths of space on the slightest provocation. The eagle perpetually screams and the flag waves through all his periods, and he exudes oratory at every pore on any imaginable pretext. His heroism is of the cheap jingo variety, and really is a form of vocal vitality rather than the expression of a patriotic sentiment. An accurate measure of the political integrity of the Senator may be gathered from the fact that he participated on behalf of the United States in the proceedings of the arbitration tribunal at Paris, voted for the protocol and signed the award. On returning to America, instead of defending his own action and the decision of the tribune, he realized that the award was unpopular and denounced it. This is the type of man it is proposed to honor at the State's expense.

All the information that comes to hand from Alaska and the Northwest Territory goes to show that very many of the adventurers, who have joined in the rush to the Klondyke diggings, will meet with bitter misfortune, and there is little or no doubt that we shall shortly be hearing many heartrending details of suffering and failure. The greatest trouble will befall those who have taken the land route via the Chilcoot and White passes, but even the river route will not unlikely be attended with unexpected hardship, as the water in the Yukon is reported to be unusually low, and the steamers will not be able to get up the stream. The tales of the struggling travelers over the inhospitable trails, which have been turned into quagmires by the traffic, are already most distressing to the friends of those who have undertaken the land journey, and there must be much loss of life and broken health as the result of the reckless rush by thousands of men, and some women, who had not the smallest conception of what they were attempting. The latest news from Dawson City extends to the end of July, and is far from reassuring with regard to the position there. Immense numbers of prospectors already on the spot have encountered failure, and the rich strikes which first caused the rush have not been repeated. The impression prevailed at Dawson that provisions would certainly be short this winter, and many persons were thinking of coming out to escape the scarcity. Mr. Ogilvie, the Dominion surveyor, has published some excellent advice, the general tenor of which is that, while there are rich promises in front of the determined prospector, the difficulties and trials that have to be overcome are immense, and the chances of disappointment far greater that they have ever been in any gold-bearing region yet discovered. The Northwestern country would seem to the prudent man to be a place which should be left to gradual development in the way of access and means of living in order that its mineral riches may be turned to account.

The dissatisfaction with conditions however happy, is the familiar attribute of the farmer. Times may be prosperous, the earth and the heavens may conspire to promote high prices for his products, yet he will still find thorns among the roses of a joyous destiny. I asked a well known insurance adjuster who had just returned from a tour in the San Joaquin if the increase in the price of wheat had not made the farmers happy. "For once they are satisfied, I suppose," I ventured. "Not a bit of it,' he answered. "They are complaining bitterly because the grocers have advanced the price of flour."

The depreciation of silver and the discontent it has precipitated in Mexico has sounded no sorrowing echoes in the hearts of L. D. Lane and his associates, who so recently purchased in the southern republic a great gold mine. The price agreed was six millions in silver, to be settled in U. S. gold coin, and they had four months to pay in. The first month has not gone, but the decline in the white metal has decreased by over a quarter of a million the cost of the purchase, which is a new instance of the good of an ill wind.

The End of the Beginning

By FRANK NORRIS

The story of the "Freja" disaster is best told by one or two extracts taken from the record left by Lieutenant Ferriss at Cape Sheridan, and by certain passages from his Ice Journal.

U. S. Cutter "Freja,"
On the ice off Cape Sheridan, Grant Land,
Lat. 82° 25' N., Lon. 61° 30' W., 12th March, 1891.

* * * We accordingly froze the ship in on the last day of September, 1890, and during the following winter drifted with the pack in a northwesterly direction. * * * On Friday, August 2d, being in Lat. 82° 25' N., Lon. 61° 30' W., the "Freja" was caught in a severe nip between two floes and was crushed, sinking in about two hours. We abandoned her, saving a hundred days' provisions and all necessary clothing, instruments, etc. * * *

I shall now attempt a southerly march over the ice, and with God's help hope to reach Tasiusak, or fall in with the relief ships or steam whalers on the way. Our party consists of the following eighteen persons. * * * All well with the exception of Mr. Bennett, the chief engineer, whose left hand has been frost-bitten. No scurvy in the party as yet.

Hamilton Ferriss, Lieut. U. S. N.,
Commanding "Freja" Arctic Exploring Expedition.

(Extracts from Lieutenant Ferriss' Ice Journal, three months later than above.)

June 13, 1891—Monday.—Camped at 4.05 p.m. about one hundred yards from the coast. The ice hereabouts is breaking up fast. If we had not been compelled to abandon our boats——but it is useless to repine. We must look our situation squarely in the face. At noon served out last beef extract, which we drank with some willow tea. Our remaining provisions consist of four-fifteenths pounds pemmican per man, and the rest of the dog meat. Where are the relief ships? We should at least have met the steam whalers long before this.

June 14th—Tuesday.—The doctor amputated Mr. Bennett's other hand to-day. Living gale of wind from S. E. Impossible to march against it in our weakened condition—must camp here till it abates. Made soup of the last of the dog meat this afternoon. Our last pemmican gone.

June 15th—Wednesday.—Everybody getting weaker. Clarke breaking down. Sent Hansen down to the shore to gather shrimps, of which it takes fifteen hundred to fill a gill measure. Supper a spoonful of glycerine and hot water.

June 16th—Thursday.—Clarke died during the night. Hawes dying. Still blowing a gale from S. E. A hard night.

June 17th—Friday.—Hawes and Cooley died during early morning. Hansen shot a ptarmigan. Made soup. Dennison breaking down.

June 18th—Saturday.—Buried Hawes and Cooley under slabs of ice. Spoonful of glycerine and hot water at noon.

June 19th—Sunday.—Dennison found dead this morning between Bennett and myself. Too weak to bury him or even carry him out of tent. He must lie where he is. Divine services at 5:30 p.m. Last spoonful of glycerine and hot water.

Ferriss paused in his writing at this point, and, looking up from the page, spoke drearily and in a thick, muffled voice: "How long has this wind been blowing, Bennett?"

"Since last Wednesday," answered the other. "Five days." Ferriss continued his writing:

"* * * Gale blowing steadily for five days. Impossible to move against it in our weakened condition. But to stay here is to perish. God help us. It is the end of everything!"

Ferriss drew a line across the page under the last entry, and, still holding the book in his hand, gazed slowly about the tent.

There were nine of them left—eight huddled together in that miserable tent—the ninth, Hansen, being down on the shore gathering shrimps. In the strange gloomy half-light that filled the tent, these survivors of the "Freja" looked less like men than like animals. Their hair and beards were long, and seemed one with the fur covering on their bodies. Their faces were absolutely black with dirt, and their limbs were monstrously distended and fat—fat as things bloated and swollen are fat. It was the abnormal fatness of starvation, the irony of misery, the huge joke that Arctic Famine plays upon those whom it afterwards destroys. The men moved about at times on their hands and knees; their tongues were round and slate-colored, like the tongues of parrots, and when they spoke they bit them helplessly.

Near the flap of the tent lay the swollen dead body of Dennison, the naturalist of the expedition. Four of the party dozed, inert and stupefied, in their sleeping-bags. The surgeon and Muck-tu, the Esquimalt dog-master, were in the center of the tent boiling their sealskin footnips over a fire built of a broken sledge-runner. Ferriss sat upon an empty water-breaker, using his knee as a desk. Near him, sitting on one of the useless McClintock sledges was Bennett, both of whose hands had been amputated in consequence of frost-bite. A tin spoon had been lashed to the stump of his right wrist.

The tent was full of foul smells. The smell of drugs and mouldy gunpowder, the smell of dirty rags, and of unwashed bodies, the smell of stale smoke, of scorched seal skin, of soaked and rotting canvass that exhaled from the tent cover—every smell but that of food.

Outside, the unleashed wind yelled incessantly, like a sabbath of witches and spun about their pitiful shelter and went rioting on, leaping and somersaulting from rock to rock, tossing handfuls of dry dust-like snow into the air, folly-stricken—insentiate—an enormous mad monster gamboling there in some hideous dance of death, capricious, headstrong, pitiless as a famished wolf.

In front of the tent, and over a ridge of barren rocks, was an arm of the sea dotted over with blocks of ice, careening past silently, while back from the coast and back from the tent and to the north and to the south and to the west stretched the illimitable waste of land—flat, grey, harsh, snow and ice and rock, rock and ice and snow, stretching away there under the sombre sky, forever and forever, gloomy, untamed, terrible, an empty region—the scarred battlefield of chaotic forces, the savage desolation of a primordial world.

"Where's Hansen?" asked Ferriss.

"He's away after shrimps," responded Bennett.

Ferriss' eyes returned to the notebook and rested on the open page thoughtfully.

"Do you know what I've written here, Bennett?" he asked, adding, without waiting for an answer: "I've written 'It's the end of everything.'"

"I suppose it is," admitted Bennett, looking vaguely about the tent. "Yes, the end of everything. It's come at last. Well?"

There was a silence. One of the men in the sleeping-bags groaned and turned upon his face. Outside the wind lapsed suddenly to a prolonged sigh of infinite sadness, clamoring again upon the instant.

"Bennett," said Ferriss, returning his notebook to the box of records, "it is the end of everything, and just because it is I want to talk to you—to ask you something."

Bennett came nearer. The horrid shouting of the wind deadened the sound of their voices—the others could not hear it, and by now it would have mattered very little to any of them if they had. Ferriss picked up an empty rubber bottle that had contained lime juice, and began fingering it.

"Old man," he commenced, "nothing makes much difference now. In a few hours we shall all be like Dennison here." He tapped the body of the naturalist, who had died during the night. It was already frozen so hard that his touch upon it resounded as if it had been a log of wood. "We shall all be like this pretty soon," continued Ferriss, "but there's a little girl back in the world we left, that I loved—that I cared for," he added, hurriedly. "I don't know as I can quite make you understand how much I—how much she was to me. I would have asked her to marry me before I came off, if I had been sure of her, but I wasn't sure, and so—well—so I never spoke. She never knew how much I cared, and I never knew if she cared at all. And that's what I want to ask you about. It's Helen Parry. You've known her all your life, and you saw her later than I did. You remember I had to come down to the ship two days before you, about the bilge pumps."

While Ferriss had been speaking the last words, Bennet had been sitting very erect upon the sledge, drawing figures and vague patterns in the fur of his sealskin coat with the tip of the tin spoon. Helen Parry! Ah, yes, Ferriss was right. Bennett had known her all his life, and it was just because of this intimacy that she had come to be so dear to him. It was she who had made everything he did seem worth while. Hardly for a moment had she been out of his thoughts during all that fearful voyage.

"It seems rather foolish," continued Ferriss, turning the rubber bag about and about, "but if I thought she ever cared—for me—in that way, why it would make—this that is coming to us, seem—oh, I don't know—easier to be borne. I say it very badly, but it would not be so hard to die if I thought that little girl loved me—a bit."

Bennett was thinking very fast. He wished now that he had overridden Helen's objections, and had allowed her people to announce their engagement before the expedition sailed. He had even half guessed something of this sort. But they two were so happy in their avowed love for each other that they had shut their eyes to everything else. They only knew that they were to be married within a month of Bennett's return. Bennett could never forget that evening when he had said good-bye to her on the porch of the old New Hampshire homestead, and had gone away to join the "Freja." She had kissed him then for the first time, and had put a hand on each shoulder and said to him:

"You must come back, Dick—you must come back to me. Remember, you are everything to me—everything in the world."

"You've known her so well," continued Ferriss, "that I am sure that she, understanding that you were my very best friend, must have said something to you about me. Tell me, did she ever say anything—give you to understand—that she cared for me—that she would have married me if I had asked her?"

Bennett wondered what to say to him. On one hand was Helen, the girl that was to be—that would have been his wife, who loved him and whom he loved. On the other was Ferriss, his chief, his friend, his hero, the man of all others whom he loved, as Johnathan loved David—such a love as can come only upon two men who have lived together, and fought together, and battled with the same dangers, and suffered the same defeats and disappointments. Bennett felt himself in grievous straits. Must he tell Ferriss the bitter truth? Must this final disillusion be added to that long train of others, the disasters, the failures, the disappointments and deferred hopes of all those past months? Must Ferriss die hugging to him this bitterness as well?

"I sometimes thought," observed Ferriss, with a weak smile, "that she did care a little. I've surely seen something like that in her eyes at certain moments. I wish I had spoken. Did she ever say anything to you? Did she ever say she cared for me?"

The thing was too cruel. Bennett shrank from it.

But suddenly an idea occurred to him. Did anything make any difference now? Why not tell his friend that which he wanted to hear, even if it were not the truth? After all that he had suffered why could he not die content at least in this? What did it matter if he spoke? Did anything matter at such a time, when they were all to perish within the next twenty-four hours? Ferriss was waiting for his answer, looking straight into his eyes.

"Yes," said Bennett, "she did say something once."

"What was it?" exclaimed Ferriss, dropping the rubber bag and bending forward.

"We had been speaking of the expedition and of you," answered Bennett, looking fixedly on the bag as it lay on the ground. "I don't know how the subject came up, but it came in very naturally at length. She said—I remember her words perfectly—she said, 'He must come back—you must bring him back to me. Remember, he is everything to me—everything in the world.'"

"She said that?" enquired Ferriss, looking away.

"Yes," answered Bennett. "I remember it. Those were her words."

"Ah!" said Ferriss, with a quick breath; then he added, "I'm glad of that. You haven't an idea how happy I am, Bennett, in spite of everything."

"Oh, yes, I guess I have," assented Bennett.

"No, no, you haven't," replied Ferriss. "How can have any idea of it? One has to love a little girl like that, Bennett, and have her—and find out—and have things come all right to appreciate it. She would have been my wife after all. I don't know how to thank you, old man. Congratulate me."

He rose a little feebly, holding out his hand. Bennett rose and instinctively extended his arm, but withdrew it suddenly. Ferriss paused abruptly, letting his hand fall to his side, and the two remained there an instant, looking at the stumps of Bennett's arms, the tin spoon still lashed to the right wrist! There was a noise of feet at the flap of the tent.

"It's Hansen," muttered Bennett.

Hansen tore open the flap of the tent.

Then he shouted to Ferriss: "Three steam whalers off the foot of the floe, sir; boat putting off! What orders, sir?"

Ferriss looked at him stupidly, as yet without definite thought, then:

"What did you say?"

Two of the men in the sleeping-bags, wakened by Hansen's shout, sat up and listened stolidly.

"Steam whalers?" said Bennett, slowly. "Where? I guess not," he added, shaking his head.

Hansen was swaying in his place with excitement.

"Three whalers," he repeated, "close in. They've put off——Oh, my God! Listen to that!"

The unmistakable sound of a steamer's whistle, raucous and prolonged, came to their ears from the direction of the coast. One of the men broke into a feeble cheer. The whole tent was rousing up. Again and again came the hoarse, insistent cry of the whistle.

"What orders, sir?" repeated Hansen.

A clamor of voices filled the tent.

Bennett came quickly up to Ferriss, trying to make himself heard.

"Old man, listen!" he cried, with eager intentness. "What I told you—just now—about Helen Parry—I thought—it is all a mistake. You don't understand——"

Ferriss was not listening.

"What orders, sir?" exclaimed Hansen, for the third time.

Ferriss drew himself up.

"Lieutenant Ferriss' compliments to the officer in charge. Tell him there are nine of us left—tell him—— oh, tell him anything you damn please." "Boys!" he cried, turning a radiant face to the men in the tent, "make ready to get out of this. We're going home—going home to our sweethearts, boys!"

IN THE KAISER'S REALM

Events and Happenings at the German Capital.

What will dear, mad, playful little ogre of a Kaiser Wilhelm do next? That's what we are all asking ourselves over here just now, and no one is as yet forthcoming with an answer. Something somewhere is out of tune. There is a jar in the wheels of State, a discord in the symphony of government. People are discontented and fretful. It's really all our dear Wilhelm s fault. He has a diversion of late, has dear Wilhelm; that of appointing, dismissing and reappointing and redismissing the officers of his army; sets them up in a row, you know, like so many tin soldiers, and then fillips them down here and there at his own dear caprice. So conducive to organization, this sort of thing, and it does make dear Wilhelm so popular in military circles.

Protests and complaints and petitions and remonstrances have been pouring throneward of late. Some of them coming from notable scholars, university professors and famous publicists. Not one of them so much as reaches dear Wilhelm. All are caught by the dam called the Privy Council. The Privy Council clip newspapers for dear Wilhelm and edit his mail, and nothing is he allowed to see that does not extol his greatness and magnify his royalty. So dear Wilhelm is growing steadily more and more unpopular.

The other day at a cafe on the Unter der Linden I heard a group of civilians discussing, in undertones, some one of dear Wilhelm's latest little pranks. They wanted to know, did these civilians, why it was that the sailing master of the Imperial yacht Hohenzollern reported for duty one morning with a nasty cut over his eye, and what a coincidence it was that dear Wilhelm had been drunk the night before. On Sunday last I called at a certain military club with a friend and overheard a couple of officers speaking of the death of Von Hahnke, an officer of the same Imperial yacht. He died with unprecedented suddenness,and we have been asked to believe that he went ashore and rode his bicycle over a cliff. I heard the Empress' name mentioned by the two officers in connection with the affair, and saw them look at one another significantly. Then how about that boy who struck dear Wilhelm and shot himself the next day? This is not a pretty story, and no doubt for that reason has never been fully told or explained by the entourage of the royal person. Boys don't go about striking Emperors for nothing. As was the audacity of the act, so must have been the magnitude of the affront which called it forth. And the boy has killed himself now. Great is the glory of the Kaiser.

But there seems to be a fate that pursues him. At precisely the right time dear Wilhelm may be confidently relied upon to do the wrong thing. Just after the late royal duel between Henri of Orleans and the Count of Turin apropos of the Abyssinia affair, dear Wilhelm sent a congratulatory telegram to Humbert of Italy felicitating him upon his young champion's success, and incidentally casting a slur upon Henri and the Orleanists. Now the Orleanists are not so marvelously popular in France, but France remembers that Henri is a Frenchman after all, especially when slightingly referred to by a German. I am told that Paris is affronted beyond words, and that theoutcome of the matter will be that dear Wilhelm will receive no bid to the 1900 Exposition, which he had set his heart upon attending.

Speaking of the duel, let me tell you that no one over here has taken Henri of Orleans seriously. We all knew that Henri was playing for the gallery when he provoked the duel, just to popularize himself and his cause in the eyes of the French. However, no one looks for any political results from the duel. Besides, they say Prince Henri did not even write the scurrilous letters that appeared over his signature in the "Figaro," and were the casus belli. Henri can't write a single sentence I am told, and had to get a chap named Mourichon, some sort of a literary adventurer, to string his phrases together. Then, too, Henri comes back from Africa branded all over with failure. He failed to obtain aught in the shape of a concession form the Negus, who does not intend to let so good a thing as an Abyssinian bank go to foreigners. Henri, they say, did get some sort of empty title not worth the ink with which it was written, and a handful of very pretty medals. Voila tout. They say, too, that the Orleanist Prince went to dine with a certain wealthy Jew named Chauchard in Tunis on his way home, with the purpose of contracting a loan. The Jew knew what was coming, but could not well refuse the Prince. However, while the dinner was in progress, he found occasion to engage his guest in a talk about "Those strange people who lunch at rich houses and ask for a loan as dessert." After that Henri was silent perforce.

A CALIFORNIA HOP-PICKING

Two Thousand Jolly People Turn it Into a Country Festival.

They have been gathering in the hop crop on the Pleasanton Company's hop ranch this week, and it's a sight worth seeing. Hop-picking occurs but once a year, but when it does it is a veritable fete champetre for all the country side. There are even plenty of families, poor families, of course, who come to the hop-picking and camp out with the rest of the pickers and make the affair a summer outing, as it were. They come in carts, or on foot, with blanket-roll and provisions, and put up their little shelter tents; mother and father and grandfather—as often as not—children by the gross, aged maternal relatives, dogs, Roentgen-ray horses, all converging upon one point like the gathering for an ancient tribal migration.

Among the Indian pickers

Any one can pick hops, and the work—barring the carrying of the huge 100-pound sacks—is easy enough. Nothing is gayer than this hop-picking business. You go down into the fields while work is in progress and the sounds of it are like those of a great Sunday-school picnic. There are some 2,000 pickers now at work on the Pleasonton ranch, and they keep up a perpetual, increasing chatter of talk and laughter and an unremitting round of horse play. Men, women and children, young fellows and girls that suggest Mr. Hardy's "Tess," ancient Indian and Mexican crones with faces like Bavarian nut-crackers, all picking away like mad, calling and shouting jokes at one another, or scrambling and jostling each other around the scales. For as fast as a man or girl or woman or boy fills his or her sack it is carried to the nearby scales and weighed in. They receive there two kinds of checks, a yellow one for the morning's work and a blue one for that of the afternoon. The yellow check is payable only at the end of the season at the office, but the blue check is as good as money and circulates as such from one picker to another or among the tradespeople of the town. At the end of the season the company redeems these checks for their face value. As a consequence of this, the afternoon's work is always heavier than the morning's—naturellement.

All sorts and conditions of people flock to these hop-pickings, Indians, Mexicans, Chinamen, tramps off the road, "bums" from the brakebeams, farmhands out of employment, factory girls on their vacation in the nearby country, little chaps from Oakland and the city's suburbs, ambitious of earning a dollar or two and at the same time having all the fun of camping out. The camp itself is a strange looking arrangement. It is laid out very, very roughly in a couple of streets, and there is every description of shelter there that can possibly be imagined, from the neatly pegged white tent that suggests the military, to woven branches, tied together at the top like a Zulu kraal. Some of the camps are even built of sacking and half a dozen poles. But the weather is warm—too warm by far—it never rains and the steam heat and electric bulbs and porcelain-lined tubs are not so much missed after all. The fun of the thing, the real fun, comes at night when the day's picking is over and supper is done with. All the camp gathers together then and the pickers sing and they play banjos, and they make love (of a surprisingly free and untrammeled variety), and they gossip—they have enough to gossip about Heaven knows—and turn in at all hours of the night, sometimes sober and sometimes otherwise, but always good-natured and jolly and care-free for a season at least.

It would surprise you to note the amount of hops that one picker can handle in a day, 80, 90, 100 and even 125 pounds is often a twelve-hours' stint, while the families average 500. The picking is paid for by the hundred pounds, eigthy cents per hundred being the wages at the Pleasanton ranch, which means anywhere from $2 to $3 a day per head and $15 to $20 a day per family, good enough wages for any one surely.

The 2,000 pickers on the Pleasanton ranch are divided into sections, A, B, C, D, and the like, 200 in each section, the Indians and Chinamen by themselves, and the better class of white people (you wouldn't believe what a very good class it is, sometimes) in their own section. To each section is allotted a stand of scales, where, as was said, the bags are weighed. From the scales the hops are carried to the drying room, a huge hot-house, with a temperature like a Hammam bath, where they lie for some twelve hours, sweating out all their natural moisture, and, incidentally, reeking off fumes that remind one of particular creamy froth on particularly sharp "steams." From the drying room they go to the cooling room (where the pickers hold dances, by the way, early in the season), and are cooled off for about a week. After which they are baled and shipped.

The shipments from the Pleasanton Company's ranch are for the most part direct to London, where the entire crop, some 3,000 bales, is usually bought en bloc and used in the making of light beer. The company has about 260 acres in hops down at Pleasanton all staked out with thousands upon thousands of poles connected overhead and with the ground by a network or string. The item of string alone amounts to a small fortune in a few years. One is led to believe that the company buys its string by the mile, and for the matter of that I was told upon the occasion of my visit that enough of this string has already been used to reach to New York and back again.

A MATRIMONIAL SWITCH

Tug-boat marriages and post-haste weddings of star actresses and other folk we read about are no uncommon events on this Western shore, but for unequalled romance in Cupid's realm the believed-to-be staid Old World at intervals can still be relied upon. Upwards of thirty years ago the sister of the present Marquis of Anglesey, then Lady Florence Paget, walked in at the door of a West-End shop in London with her fiancee, Mr. Henry Chaplin, and leaving him there emerged from another exit, hailed a cab, and drove to St. George's Church, Hanover Square, where she was married to the last Marquis of Hastings, the greatest plunger the British turf has ever seen. Now comes a not very different story. On Thursday, the 5th of last month, Miss Violet Grey-Egerton, sister of Sir Philip H. B. Grey-Egerton, Bart., of Oulton Park, Cheshire, was to have been married to Mr. Ernest Cunard, in whose company she had been on the previous Monday, parting from him, it is said, on the best of terms. A night's reflection, however, changed the maiden mind, and on the Tuesday led the Lady Violet to the same altar as her counterpart, the Lady Florence, where, supported and given away by her maid, she joined hands with an old lover, Lord Romilly, whose lawyer, the well-known, and for the occasion well-named, Mr. Hastie, played the part of best man. Orange blossoms, bridesmaids, pages, lines of gallant soldiers, as there might have been, for Lord Romilly is of the Guards, there were none, and the bride was habited in a simple traveling dress of black and white. When the news broke upon an astonished world it was remembered that Lady Romilly, as she now is, had been engaged to her husband long ago, but that the affair, as well as two other engagements, had been broken off somehow or another.

Lady Violet Grey-Egerton, now Lady Romilly, was born in 1870, and is the only surviving daughter of the eleventh baronet of his line, the baronetcy having been created in 1617, and the Earls of Wilton being members of the same family. She is a pretty, quiet-looking girl, whose style has been much admired, and society has been simply amazed at the happening here chronicled.

Lord Romilly is thirty-one years of age and a Lieutenant in the Coldstream Guards. His family first came to England from France as refugees after the Edict of Nantes, and has for generations been distinguished at the bar and on the bench, the first Baron Romilly, the great lawyer, having been created in 1866. The family seat is Porthkerry, Cowbridge, Glamorganshire.

The American public, said Mr. P. T. Barnum, like to be fooled, but it has remained for the San Francisco public to enjoy being bullied and imposed upon. Probably in no other city in America will be found so many existing nuisances as right here in this town of the Golden Gate. Certanly no other citizens could be found who would so meekly endure them. If this statement should be doubted, let the reader take a walk down Front, Sansome or Battery streets anywhere in the vicinity of Sutter, and at almost any hour of the day. His walk will be interrupted at almost every hundred feet by the passing back and forth of a multitude of handcarts, trundling barrels, bales and heavily loaded boxes, while his path will be impeded, and at some points actually blocked by hundreds of freight packages of every description, fruit boxes, butter boxes, molasses hogsheads, tar barrels, flour barrels, dried fruit crates, and the like. Not infrequently it has been our lot to be obliged to walk out into the street and around a truck in order to pass in front of a store, most of whose goods were heaped upon the sidewalk. Sometimes a gangway is actually run from the doorway of a store to the back of a dray in order to handle shipments more readily. The thing has been going on for a long time under the very eyes of the Supervisors and the Superintendent of Streets, and of late has become intolerable. Not only does a sidewalk blocked in this manner become an unspeakable nuisance, but it is also a positive menace to life and limb. Boxes and barrels piled as high as we have often seen them need but a slight push to send them toppling down upon the heads of the luckless pedestrian who ventures into this benighted district. Perhaps some day this will happen, and the attention of the "powers that be" will be attracted. At any rate something quite out of the ordinary must befall ere the people of the city and the other people who are paid to govern it will be aroused from their apathy.

CALIFORNIA BICYCLE TOURING

The "Chance Acquaintance" Club and Its Fortnightly Spins.

There is a new kind of club here in San Francisco that calls itself the "Chance Acquaintance Cyclers," and that bids fair to be a tremendous success. If you are a good sort and can ride a wheel indifferent well you are eligible. The "Chance Acquaintances" are cyclers who go upon bi-monthly wheeling tours. They have no headquarters. In fact their clubhouse is a good road without grades, and their assembly hall is out of doors. Even people who don't wheel can and do join these fortnightly whirls, riding along with the procession in the wagons that carry the luncheons.

The club is for both sexes, about as many girls as men belong, and some of the latter can cut out a pace that makes their brothers and husbands pedal their best to keep up to them. Note en passant that the girls have the good commonsense to ride the diamond frame and not the drop frame machines, and that bloomers are the rule almost without a single exception. This kind of cycling is somewhat different from the game as it is played in the East. The organization is different, for one thing, more practical and feasible, and the weather can be counted on with the certainty of cogged dice. If the roads are not always so hard and well kept, they do on the contrary, lead through stretches of country that could only be reached in an Eastern State after a half day's train ride.

But the "Chance Acquaintances,' for instance, reached Bear valley on their last outing, after two hours travel over the North Pacific Coast R. R. They went across on the 8 o'clock Sausalito boat, and took the train as far as Point Reyes, at which station their two reserved cars —they filled them from end to end—were side-tracked and the wheels debarked. Bear valley is one of the prettiest points attainable on this line, or, for that matter, by any railway in the State. The valley is almost a canyon, and the road, running on its very bottom, is nearly covered with a roof of dense foliage. A silver stream trickles along side, opening into pools where the shadows play gracefully. It was the jolliest kind of a ride. Some of the "Acquaintances" had their cameras along, some had brought their bathing suits, and one man made an entire orchestra of himself with banjo, harmonica, bones, triangle and the like, all of which he managed to play simultaneously. The club made Olema, and wayside refreshment at 11:15, went on by the fish hatchery and the Shafter ranch, and entered the grounds of the Country Club's preserves at about noon. Lunch came next, brought up by a couple of coaches and eaten picnic fashion on the grass. Four miles further on, however, was the beach, and those that had brought their suits pushed ahead and had a dip in the early afternoon.

This Sunday outing, passed on a bicycle is a first-class idea, and is bound to become popular. About the best part of it is its cheapness and feasibility. The railroad furnished round-trip transportation tickets at a dollar, which is nominal enough surely considering the amount of fun the "Chance Acquaintances" got out of the day's run. Scorching or riding ahead of the line is heartily discouraged, so that novices are by no means debarred the sport. All the club asks of you is that you come prepared to have a good time, and that you "keep up with the procession."

ANOTHER LEGEND SPOILED

The Enchanted Mesa Proves Barren of Sensation.

The enchanted mesa of the Acoma valley in New Mexico is enchanted no longer. The Fairy Prince in the shape of a college professor with a life saving cannon has come along and touched it and the spell has vanished. Like the man in "Used Up," Professor Libbey has "been there, looked in, and there's nothing in it.'

But he had all the fun of trying. He got there, any way. He was a Princeton man, and one hopes that he planted a black and orange flag on the top, and that he and his companions gave the skyrocket yell when their feet trod that untrod soil. No, there was nothing there. But if Mr. Andree or Mr. Peary reach the Pole they won't find much more. The fun of the thing is in trying and succeeding, or even trying and failing. Mr. Libby, professor of physical geography at Princeton university, has tried and though he has succeeded in getting on top of the historic inaccessible mesa has failed to find anything there that was worth his trouble. Professor Libbey in writing of his undertaking says: The idea occurred to me about three years ago that by utilizing the apparatus of the life saving service a shot line might be carried over the mesa at it narrowest point, and then stouter lines hauled over until one could be put into position that was strong enough to stand the strain of its own weight plus that of a man together with the frictional strain produced by its weight passing over the line. I found that I could obtain the co-operation of the life saving service, and all my plans were perfected in the fall of 1895. They were interfered with at the time, and since then no favorable opportunity has presented itself until this summer.

Professor Libbey arrived at the mesa about the end of July, the major portion of his baggage consisting of 1,500 feet of coiled rope, what he calls "faking boxes," and the cannon to be employed in shooting the line. The first shot failed to clear the rock though the elevation was 45 degrees. The projectile struck some hundred feet below the crest and breaking in two dropped back. The second trial, however, was a complete success. "The line," says the professor, "rattled merrily out of the box and the shot reached its greatest height directly over the mesa. After a few seconds the cord stopped leaving the box, and we knew from the fact that very little cord was left in the box that it must be very near the bottom opposite us, for an angular measurement had given the height of the mesa at about 500 feet."

For the next two days the party were occupied in hauling the heavier ropes across the summit. The friction, and consequently the difficulty in handling the ropes becoming greater with the greater thickness of each succeeding line. The first lines were hauled over by hand. The half-inch rope required the assistance of a horse, and the inch rope proved too much for the combined strength of the horse and all the members of the party. More horses, however, were secured and in a few hours, the main line was in place. Then a couple of blocks were reaved to either end of the line and if such a thing as a Casual Observer had existed in that New Mexico desert he would have been treated to the sight of a venerable college professor swinging in mid-air from a perilously small boatswain's chair, his venerable legs dangling below him and his venerable hands clutching with frantic intensity at the thin ropes that supported his seat.

"At last, however, the venerable professor reached and stood upon the rock and spent some two hours walking up and down upon the mesa and going to and fro in it." It was said that he struck a splendid site for a pueblo, but there was, unfortunately, no splendid pueblo in sight, nothing but a pile of rocks that were probably the work of erosion. "No bits of pottery, no household utensils, no traces of construction of any sort." So the professor climbed down again and went his way a sadder but no wiser man.

I don't suppose the top of that mesa is very large, but en passant, it seems to me that after all those long months, years, even, of preparation and all his talk and these elaborate "fake boxes" and "Lyle guns" and projectiles, and heaven knows what all, I would have stayed up on that confounded mesa longer than a beggarly couple of hours.

Wheat continues to go up and silver continues to go down. The beloved metal in our revered dollar has been brutally quoted as worth only forty-three cents. Meanwhile we hear nothing of the once well-known law which required the values of wheat and silver to rise and fall together. Is it possible that the plutocrats have got at that law and clandestinely repealed it, just as they committed the awful crime of seventy-three when nobody was looking? We trust that none of our Populistic farmers has been so guilty of treason to his principles as to sell his wheat at the enhanced prices which have been created by the early plutocrats. If any have done so, it can only be with the clever design of investing the proceeds of the crop in silver and waiting for the rise in the value of the dear white metal to turn the tables on the plutocrats. We sincerely trust that many of our Populistic friends have seen the wisdom of such a course, and we wish them joy while waiting.

The successor of the bicycle is said to have made its appearance in the bicycle skate, the invention of two Scotchmen, Robert and George Anderson of Edinburgh. The skate—each one weighs two pounds—consists of a thin bar of brass with a fork at either end, in which the wheels, six inches in diameter, are set. The rims are of steel, and the tires of cushion rubber. The skates are equipped with straps for ordinary road use, but these have been removed and regulation racing shoes firmly attached to the plates with rivets. This change has been made by Earle Reynolds, who has created world's records for all sorts of skating. Mr. Reynolds declares that the new invention is to supercede the bicycle and advances many arguments in its favor, claiming that it is a healthier form of amusement, more convenient and is as comfortable to travel on over a country road as a bicycle.

Ex-Senator Blackburn, of Kentucky, has lost much of his old-time political popularity. Previous to his defeat for re-election to the Senate he had been in office continuously for twenty-five years, during which period he distinguished himself more for his personal accomplishments than for practical work. To this and to the disaffection among ambitious younger men may be ascribed Mr. Blackburn's forced retirement. These ambitious young politicians found the Senator in the way of their advancement and accordingly put him out of the race.

Ex-Secretary Carlisle is in favor of the nomination in every State, at all elections, of tickets by the Sound Money Democrats. Mr. Carlisle thinks this is the only way to preserve what he calls "simon pure Democratic principles." He is still uncompromisingly opposed to the Bryan platform, regarding it as altogether undemocratic. Mr. Carlisle will speak in Kentucky in support of the gold Democratic nominee for Clerk of the Court of Appeals.

LEOPOLD NOT WANTED

The Belgian Monarch Undesirable as Arbitrator between America and Japan.

It has been reported that Japan suggests that Leopold, King of the Belgians, be nominated as arbiter of the little unpleasantness between herself and this country in the Honolulu matter, and as far as Uncle Sam is concerned this discredited monarch is very likely to "referee the contest." To anyone who is at all acquainted with contests of any kind it is notably evident that the referee must have no bets upon the event nor be in any way financially interested in the result.

QUEEN OF BELGIUM

As a matter of fact, Leopold is just this. His interest — his financial interest — in the outcome of the dispute may be even termed intense. In fact he is quite the very last person who should be accepted by the United States. No wonder Japan suggested him. Leopold, it must be understood, would rather be continually getting into some tremendous money making scheme as principle stockholder than be ruling his people. His very latest venture, and one in which he is the prime mover, is nothing less that the Japanese-Belgian Trading Co., involving a fortnightly line of steamers between Antwerp and Yokohama. The company and the steamship line of course draw heavy subsidies from the Jap government. Besides this the Mikado's government have extended all sorts of privileges and courtesies to the new companies and Leopold can do no less than to show himself appreciative and conciliatory. He is under obligations to the Japs, and nobody knew that better than the Japs themselves when they suggested him as arbiter.

And even outside of his intimacy with the Japanese, Leopold is not a man to be relied upon for fair treatment. His own people have sued him in the law courts of his kingdom on more than one occasion, and have come unpleasantly near fastening upon him dirty charges of sharp practice. The Rothschilds have long ago closed all financial dealings with him, and have forced him to encourage such atrocious vulgarians as the late "Colonel" North, the nitrate king. Besides this it is of almost notorious report that Leopold is personally interested in several of the big gambling houses at Spa, and on more than one occasion has vented his royal wrath upon the heads of those daring justices who have attempted to close them. The Congo company as well is a pet scheme of the Belgian monarch, and has been a source of tremendous financial waste. Leopold, it is said, has not only squandered his own revenues upon the chimera, but has also poured into the mid-African jungles his sister's fortune, which was given to him in trust. His sister is the once demented Queen Carlotta. She has long since been completely cured of her malady, and it is said is only kept in restraint to prevent her making demand for the money upon her brother.

One last incident must not be passed over, since, better than anything else, it gives an insight into Leopold's character. It is always the custom in European courts for the monarch to present to departing Ambassadors some token of esteem. These presents are usually in the form of gold cigar or snuff boxes. Some years ago a certain diplomat who was about to leave Brussels was presented with a beautiful cigarette case by Leopold. A few days afterwards a note arrived from the palace asking that the case be returned in order to have some engraving done upon it. The Ambassador at once complied, but never again did he see his cigarette case. He heard of it, however, four years afterwards, how it had been presented to another diplomat, and how in a few days this diplomat had received a similar message asking for its return on the same pretext, and how, of course, it never was sent back. It is probably still in use, a sort of stock cigarette case that answers on all occasions. Of such calibre is the man who is now called upon to judge between Japan and this country.

The Graeco-Turkish war brought forth the first special war correspondent on a wheel, Mr. Willard Pollock, of the London "Morning Post," thus disporting himself on the plains of Thessaly.

Aubrey Beardsley has been received into the Roman Catholic Church. The set of "Tannhaeuser" pictures which he is drawing illustrate the orthodox legend.

A DEBUTANTE'S DIARY

Entertainments and Happenings In Town and Out.

Do you know, Diary dear, that I am absolutely destitute of news this week? There is simply nothing going on—not even a choice bit of gossip. I am thinking of doing something desperate just to create a sensation. I thought at first of eloping, but when I broached the matter to my especial chums, could not find one willing to take me without the wedding presents and trousseau. Men are a self-seeking crowd nowadays. Oh, had I but lived in the Gretna Green, stage coach era! Then I thought of going to Coffee Creek and taking up a claim, but the stories I heard of roads swarming with rattlesnakes and lined with grizzly bears rather discouraged me. I do not want to be wafted heavenward yet, even if things be dead here below.

I went on Saturday to the matinee to hear, or rather, to see, "The Heart of Maryland," at the Baldwin. I enjoyed it, but what was more entertaining than the play was a theatre party given by Mrs. J. Downey Harvey to a dozen little maidens, as a sort of farewell to her daughter, Anita. The children really seemed to have a capital time, and amused every one. Mrs. Harvey left for the East on Wednesday, with her two little girls. She contemplates leaving Anita at the Sacred Heart Convent, in Manhattanville.

I heard an interesting bit of gossip with regard to a recent matrimonial event. It appears that the mother of the young man would give her consent only on condition that they put off the affair until January next. This they absolutely refused to do, and were married immediately. The mother went to the wedding, but gave no present and washed her hands of the whole affair. The young people went on their honeymoon, have now returned, and have sent out cards. The question at present agitating social circles is whether they should be recognized or not. A number of the girls say no, and many of the mother's friends intend turning a cold shoulder to the bride. There seems to be no reason other than unkindness for this conduct. True, the bride was a poor girl—but she is pretty, sweet, bright, lively, and intelligent. The groom has been a friend of all the other girls, and they return his various kindnesses by slighting the woman he has chosen to honor. Were there aught against the bride's reputation they might have some reason, but as it is her sole inferiority lay in her lack of this world's goods. I wonder, do they consider the consequences of their determination. Can they blame the girl if, when her own class refuse to recognize her, she seeks congenial society elsewhere. I, for one, am going to stand by her, and shall try and persuade the nicest of the girls to do likewise.

Every one speaks of returning to town about the middle of September. The L. L. Bakers and the Stowes will be back then, although their plans for the winter are very uncertain. They may remain here or may spend the season in Boston. Mrs. Oelrichs and Birdie Fair are on their way out here from the east. The Hagers, McMonagles, Tobins, etc., will all be in town very soon.

We do not seem to hear much of the debutantes of this season. Are they going to burst upon us suddenly? Their coming is not being dicussed as was ours a year ago. I wonder why? They are certainly a lively set of maidens, and several of them are exceedinly pretty. Let me see, there are Marie Wells, Ethel Keeney, Leontine Blakeman, Mamie Polhemus, Margaret Salisbury, and several others. I have not seen a picture of one of them thus far, and last year we were hurled upon an expectant world in July. I wonder, are these maidens wiser? I doubt it, and, surely, our success was sufficient to warrant a precedent.

I had a letter from New York the other day, and hear from it that Mr. and Mrs. La Montague, nee Catherwood, are to be in Newport during September. Mr. La Montague is to be the judge of the Hunters' Classes at the Horse Show in Long Branch. Dr. and Mrs. Grinnell are at their place at Milford, Connecticut. Mrs. La Montague may come out here later on to visit her mother, Mrs. Darling.

Mr. Rudolph Spreckels is back from the Hawaiian Islands, and all the San Rafael people seem to be having a good quiet time The weather is really heavenly over there, and no one seems desirous of returning to the city.

And, now, for another week, adieu. Yours affectionately, MISS CRICKET.

The Starr King Fraternity's opening meeting of the year took place last evening at the Fraternity rooms in the First Unitarian Church. Miss Bertha Monroe Rickoff read a short paper on "Quo Vadis," after which the book was discussed by Miss Rickoff, Rev. C. W. Wendte, Col. John P. Irish, and others.

Among future matrimonial events, is the wedding of Miss Sadie Samuels and Mr. Isaac Forman, which is to be celebrated on September 14th. Miss Samuels is a daughter of Mr. D. Samuelsof the Lace House, and Mr. Forman is secretary to the Campo Seco Mining & Canal Co., of which his father is president.

A rather unexpected event was the wedding of Mr. C. W. Gregg and Mrs. Maud Shirley Page, which occurred in San Jose a few days ago, Rev. Dr. Wakefield officiating. Mr. Gregg is connected with the California Safe Deposit and Trust Company, and Mrs. Page is a daughter of the late Paul Shirley, at one time Warden at San Quentin. The home of the couple will be in Berkeley.

Mr. Wheeler is certainly to be congratulated upon winning so charming a woman as Mrs. Alice Meyers, to whom he was married on Wednesday night last. The bride is the widow of the late Colonel Meyers, of Oakland, who officiated as chairman of the State Central Committee, I think. She is a very interesting and fascinating woman, endowed with good looks and sound intelligence. She wore a costume of green cloth trimmed with broad white braid, a white tulle and green velvet cape trimmed with black astrakhan, and a black velvet plume hat faced with rose-pink velvet, from which it may be gathered that the wedding was informal. It was celebrated at the home of Dr. McLean in Oakland, who performed the ceremony. Subsequently the wedding party adjourned to town and had supper and drank appropriate toasts in the private dining room of a leading restaurant. Mr. Wheeler is the elder brother of Charles S. Wheeler, and is a member of the firm of Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson. The happy pair, after the usual trip to Del Monte, will reside at Mr. Wheeler's home at 813 Hyde street.

Mr. and Mrs. De Guigne and family have returned, after being nine months abroad. They have gone down for the present to their home at San Mateo, but later Mrs. De Guigne goes to Colorado Springs for a short sojourn.

On Sunday afternoon next, Miss Alice Friedlander and her fiance, Mr. E. H. Lauer, of Portland, are to be at home at the new residence of Manager S. H. Friedlander, 2603 Steiner street. It is the realization of a love affair of old standing, this engagement, for the happy pair have known each other since their school days. Mr. Lauer has devoted himself to analytical chemistry, and is a member of the large wholesale drug house of Blumauer, Frank & Co. Miss Friedlander is a very pretty and accomplished girl, who has attained some literary distinction. She is a member of the Philomath, Women's Press Club and other organiaztions. The marriage will occur early next year.

It has been delightfully gay at Del Monte these latter days. The tennis tournament proved a great success and attracted a jolly crowd of young people to the great caravansary. The weather was delightful, and there was a spirit of fun and jollity in the air that proved catching. Though the gathering was not so large as that which flocks to the shoots, there was more of the old sparkle and fun than Del Monte has had in years. This was due to the presence of Mr. Oelrichs and Mr. Webster, who organized entertainments and excursions which kept every one busy.

After their victory on Saturday the Whitney boys were heroized very much as were the victors in the classic games of ancient Greece. Instead of the Stadion the scene of their triumph is Del Monte, and in place of bay leaves their trophies have taken the form of claret pitchers. But even so, the Del Monte court was as hotly contested as was the classic plain, and silver mounted claret pitchers are likely to last longer than leaves of bay. The playing was unusually brilliant and the attendant crowd large and appreciative. The work of both sides was good—so much so that victory seemed to favor one almost as much as the other up to the end, when it finally settled on Bob and George. Sam Hardy and Walter Magee made many excellent points, Magee creating a favorable impression with his steady play. The second prize was a set of silver hair brushes.

The splendid game seemed to put every one in good spirits and to keep them there for some time. The ball in the evening was unusually gay and the attendance much larger than usual.

Across the Bay.

Although there has been a faint glimmer of brightness in the social atmosphere this week, nothing has as yet been suggested with regard to the various dancing clubs. The managers of the Deux Temps and Friday Fortnightly of last season are not particularly anxious to resume the responsibility, and there seems to be considerable difficulty in finding others willing to take up their duties. The office of Lady Manager in one of these societies is no sinecure. In the first place, it is not easy to limit the number of the aspirants without giving offence. The managers are also supposed to introduce the young people one to another; and lastly, they are expected to see that the less attractive among the maidens are not kept partnerless during the evening. Then the conscience of the members is quite elastic in regard to the payment of dues, or, perhaps, they suffer from sadly delinquent memories. Last season, after the final meeting of several of the classes, the managers had to pay the expenses themselves. All these things are not encouraging to the would-be organizer. One is apt to lose prestige, friends, and money.

and gain the name of being a snob, a crank, and nouveau riche. Such has been the experience of more than one manager in the past, and history, even in dancing clubs, is apt to repeat itself.

Birthday dinners seem to be the order of things this week. On Monday evening, Mrs. J. A. Folger gave a small affair in honor of her son, Mr. Athearn Folger. The menu was capital, the decorations in excellent taste. Among those bidden were Mrs. Hayes and the Misses Hayes, Mrs. Crooks, Mr. Greenway, Mr. and Mrs. Spreckels, etc.

I understand that Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Folger have returned from their southern trip, and are staying with Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Smith (nee Moffitt). Another birthday dinner was given on Wednesday by Mr. and Mrs. Frank Adams. It was a pleasant affair. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. Jordan, Mr. and Mrs. Adrian, Mrs. Agard, etc.

A farewell entertainment was given by Judge and Mrs. Rosborough last week to celebrate the departure of Mr. Joseph Rosborough, who has gone to Stanford to study. It was in the shape of a minstrel show, and proved exceedingly amusing.

Miss Hattie Hoobler, who is at present visiting Mrs. W. E. Sharon, was entertained last week by the boys of the Phi Gamma Delta fraternity. Half a dozen of the younger set, chaperoned by Mrs. Sharon and Mrs. Havens spent the evening in dancing and music. Among the girls were Miss Fore, Miss Jean Howard, Miss Havens, and Miss Florence Sharon.

An interesting musicale was given last week by Mrs. Davis, of Alameda, in honor of Mr. Paul Davis, of Grand Rapids, Michigan. Miss May Williams, who has a pretty soprano voice, gave several selections.

A jolly little launch party was given last week to about ten young people by Mrs. Charles Rudolph, on the "Mascot." They steamed around the bay, visiting the various points of interest.

There is to be a big garden fete given at the home of Mrs. Baker, on Saturday, September 11th, in aid of St. Paul's Church. It is to be a very smart affair. All the leading lights are to take part.

The Poster Girl.

(After "The Blessed Damozel.")

The blessed Poster-girl leaned out
  From a pinky-purple heaven.
One eye was red and one was green;
  Her bang was cut uneven;
She had three fingers on her hand,
  And the hairs on her head were seven.

Her robe, ungirt from clasp to hem,
  No sunflowers did adorn;
But a heavy Turkish portiere
  Was very neatly worn;
And the hat that lay along her back
  Was yellow like canned corn.

It was a kind of wobbly wave
  That she was standing on,
And high aloft she flung a scarf
  That must have weighed a ton;
And she was rather tall—at least
  She reached up to the sun.

She curved and writhed, and then she said,
  Less green of speech than blue:
"Perhaps I am absurd—perhaps
  I don't appeal to you;
But my artistic worth depends
  Upon the point of view."

I saw her smile, although her eyes
  Were only smudgy smears;
And then she swished her swirling arms,
  And wagged her gorgeous ears.
She sobbed a blue-and-green-checked sob,
  And wept some purple tears.

Notes of the Playhouses — Events to Come.

In "The Sportsman," the Alcazar presents the only dramatic novelty of the week. It is a bright little piece, full of witty words and funny situations. And it is agreeably played. J. M. Colville, as Harry Briscoe, lapses into comedy with acceptable energy, and makes the character luminous and intelligent. Another good piece of comedy is

DON M. CANN

Wallace Shaw's Dr. Holroyd, the traditional friend of the family, who sets everything wrong endeavoring to set them right. Miss Selene Johnson has a style peculiarly her own—one that improves upon acquaintance. As Mrs. Briscoe, she has a part of many emotions, but she plays it evenly and agreeably and leaves a good impression. Mrs. Bates has one of her old-time characters as Mrs. Fritchley, the landlady with a reputation to look to, and she guards it cleverly.

Preceding "The Sportsman," is played the one-act piece, "The Old Guard." The play is familiar—old Hauresack is quite a character, and George Trader in developing it displays considerable versatility. He makes the old soldier quite natural and true to life. Of the other characters, or rather, of how they were played, the least said the very much better.

At the Orpheum this week Stanley Whiting and his eminent colored assistant have succeeded in making a fair impression. Mr. Whiting is at least unique in singing coon songs to the accompaniment of a white face and a dress suit. But as he sings well and plays the piano cleverly his inconsistency may be overlooked. William Demount, the assistant, plays acceptably on the banjo and brings in a lot of amusing remarks. Leoal Mitchell, the living doll, is daintily clever. She possesses a really remarkable voice for so small a body, and she uses it in a most agreeable manner. The diminutive Hungarian band is still playing into popular favor, but it might be mentioned that if the little fellow with the cymbals would play with less energy the general effect would be much more acceptable.

The revival of "The Fire Patrol" at Morosco's this week has resulted with satisfaction on both sides of the curtain. The mechanical effects are well managed, and the characters all capably sustained. Fred Butler plays the hero, a change from his usual villainy, but the guise of virtue becomes him well. Maud Edna Hall is a pretty and pathetic heroine, and little Alice Condon is a clever little waif. Next week Frank Gassaway's military play, "The Dandy Fifth," will be produced. The piece, which has already a successful record, tells of the doings of the famous Dandy Fifth, a regiment composed of Boston society men. The scene is in Georgia during Sherman's march to the sea.

DRAMATIC NOTES

Miss May Lucine Potvin, the eastern pianist, will make her first appearance in this city, at Sherman & Clay Hall, next Saturday afternoon. Miss Potvin is a pupil of Amy Fay and Fannie Bloomfield Zeissler, and is herself a teacher of some note. This will be Miss Potvin's only recital.

At the opening recital of Walther, the Belgian violinist, next Thursday evening, Miss Hext will give a dramatic reading from "Leah the Forsaken." During the remainder of Herr Walther's engagement Miss Hext will be heard in readings from the different works of modern writers.

Last Thursday's "Musical Evening" at Byron Mauzy Hall came off unusually well. It was under the direction of James Hamilton Howe, being the fourth of his Soiree Musicales. The programme was given by Mr. Howe's leading pupils, assisted by pupils of Bernhard Wollenhaeur. It was made up of carefully selected numbers, which were all executed with more than ordinary skill and finish.

The eminent gymnasts, Van Aucken, McShee and Hill, open at the Orpheum Monday evening in a performance on the triple horizontal bar. The other new people are Barton and Ashley, the "Walking Delegates;" Lillian Leslie and Don M. Cann, operatic and descriptive singers, and the renowned equilibrist. The Kaffas, Mr. Stanley Whiting and his colored assistant have made a hit and will be retained.

Mr. Pierre Douillet, pianist, and Mr. Edward Xavier Rolker, lyric tenor, open the musical season with a piano and song recital at Sherman, Clay & Co. Hall next Wednesday evening. Mr. Douillet is at the head of the piano forte department in the University of the Pacific, and is said to be a clever performer. Mr. Rolker is a pupil of Gustave Engel of Berlin, and, from his press notes, possesses a voice of much excellence.

LILLIAN LESLIE
Who is to appear at the Orpheum

The fourth and final week of "The Heart of Maryland" opens at the Baldwin Monday evening. There will be a special matinee on Thursday. Mr. William H. Crane will be the Baldwin's next attraction, opening on Monday, September 13th, in his new play, "A Fool of Fortune." Mr. Crane will also appear in "My Wife's Father" and Eugene Presbey's comedy, "A Virginia Romance," which will be given for the first time on any stage on Monday, September 20th.

The reproduction of "The First Born" at the Alcazar next week will be under the personal supervision of Mr. David Belasco, who has been actively engaged in preparing the now famous play for its New York and London premieres. At the Alcazar the piece will be given with the original cast, and, with Mr. Belaco's new ideas, should prove of additional interest. Sydney Grundy's well known comedy, "Lost for a Day," will precede "The First Born" and will be given with a capable cast. A special matinee is on for Admission Day.

"The Twelve Temptations," which opens at the Columbia, is announced as a "realized dream of Oriental splendor." The plot deals with true love that didn't run smooth, touched up with a fairy element, and fairly overflowing with rattling up-to-date comedy. Surely, a promise of much pleasure—and there is also a grand ballet composed of ladies both young and statuesque. The Rosaires are in the company, also Gus Bruno, Jr., Josie Sisson, Rose Kesner, and Caroline Rudolph. The engagement is for two weeks.

The fifth week of the grand opera at the Tivoli will be given to double bill performances of Leoncavallo's tragic opera, "Pagliacci," and Mascagni's great composition, "Cavalleria Rusticana." "Pagliacci" will be given with the original orchestration rendered by the symphony orchestra. Mme. Kronold and Elvia Krox will alternate as Nedda; Michelina will sing Canio; Mertens, Tonio; Boyce, Peppe; and Raffael, Silvio. In "Cavalleria," Mme. Kronold alternates with Miss Stewart as Santuzza; Katherine Fleming-Hinrichs assumes Lola; Bernice Holmes, Lucia; Rhys Thomas, Turiddu; and John J. Raffael, Alfio. Mignon and Faust are in prepartion.

THE AMERICAN HUSBAND

Paul Bourget's Clever Analysis of a Newport Household and Its Hostess.

M. Paul Bourget has been dissecting us again, picking us to pieces with the tiny, delicate, little lancets and scalpels and probes, getting down to the very bone and marrow of us with a dexterity and precision that makes us wince a litfle during the operation, the more so because it is all so lamentably exact. One wonders at times, however, if this method is the best one to apply to the lives and people of these United States. We are—to European eyes, certainly—a huge, crude, rough people of simple, unformed vices and virtues rather elemental as yet; have not yet had time to develop all the multitudinous semi-vices and demi-virtues of older or of more degenerate peoples, let us say. Would not the pick-axes and sledge-hammer method—of M. Zola, for instance—suit us better, knocking us to pieces, as it were, and getting at the core of us with a half-dozen mighty blows. This infinitesimal scraping and scratching and niggling little drillings and the like seem somehow inappropriate. It suggests the cutting up of a mastodon with a penknife and a pair of toilet scissors.

However, "Two Families" ("Deux Menages") is the title of Bourget's last dissection. Personally, I find it something too long. A millionaire New Yorker mismated with a frivolous "society leader" and a wife discovers a parallel mesalliance in the case of a contortionist and his wife, a professional reciter of poems. The New York millionaire wills some $20,000 to the contortionist and then dies, voila tout. Bourget takes nine pages of a magazine to tell this story, which Mr. Kipling could put into four. But Kipling strikes off a single picture. Bourget, as we have said, dissects and dissects and dissects. Just now he takes up the American magnates:

"Men of affairs," he says, "prodigious money-handlers, to a man self-made, who in ten or twenty years have been able to conquer for themselves fortunes and powerful positions that can only be compared to those of the feudal despots of the Middle Ages. These railroad magnates, who possess twelve hundred, fifteen hundred, two thousand kilometers of railroad, these potentates of petroleum mines, of silver mines, of copper mines, who figure up their gains as a King might figure up his budget; these constructive Napoleons who build and baptize in the mid-desert towns of a hundred thousand souls, these are the personages whom I approached with real intellectual delight."

So much for the magnate in general. The magnate in particular, Tennyson Harris, hero of the story, Bourget describes in these words:

"Opposite the lady of the house, at the other end of the table, a man was sitting, a man of any age, of a timid air, the face leaden gray, the mouth set in an expression of bitterness, the eyes dimmed by a look of frightful weariness—the fatigue of a nervous strain of eighteen hours' work per day prolonged for thirty-five years. Mr. Harris had been dowered with the constitution of an athlete. His broad shoulders, his bull neck, his muscular hands, his salient jaw, betrayed a temperament that had been called upon to withstand an expense of cerebral energy evidently superhuman, and to-day, before his fiftieth birthday was reached, he was at the end of his strength.

"Of what does he think, this singular man?" exclaims Bourget. "He is intelligent, for he has triumphed over all his rivals in the ferocious competition of this country. Already in the grip of death, why does he still continue to strive? He will not last a year. He is as sober as a Bedouin of the desert. He has not time to keep a mistress, he seems so simple in his tastes. What can be his ambitions? To advertise his wealth? He is dressed like a clerk. To make a social position for himself? He never stirs in society. Indulge his wife? If he was in love with her he would not permit these eight-month absences of hers in Europe, and he would resent the attention that is evidently paid to her. What would I not give," says M. Bourget, "to listen to the little thought that this instant is knocking behind his grizzled forehead."

But Tennyson Harris has a wife; a great social leader; quite a type in her way. Quite possibly Mrs. Bradley Martin is intended, or Mrs. August Belmont. Here she is a la Bourget:

"Mrs. Harris was almost too beautiful, her mouth too red, her teeth too clean, her nails too much manicured, her fingers too heavily loaded with rings, and she wore a summer toilette so much in fashion that she seemed like a dressmaking advertisement—like some animated doll that an enterprising costumier might have gotten up for purposes of exploitation. She had not talked to me half an hour before I discovered that she was too intelligent, too much in the swim, too Parisienne, knowing too well that Madame de A. was about to break with M. de B.; that C-Ds were ruined, and that they were ambitious to marry their daughter with the Marquis de E. The yellow-covered novel, whose leaves she cut with a shell paper-knife encrusted with roses, was not yet upon the boulevards in Paris. And this paper-cutter itself, the latest creation of a jeweler in the Rue de la Paix, was to be a fad of to-morrow.

A dinner at a magnate's house gives Bourget an admirable opportunity for decrying what he chooses to believe is the senseless luxury of the Gothamites:

"The flowers alone—they were chiefly of the kind that are called 'American Beauties,' and that are worth a dollar apiece—represented the annual income of several little French landlords; enameled China followed painted China, and a service of Saxe, that suggested a museum, came after a service of Sevres marked with the imperial arms. * * * The twenty people who gathered about the table, I was told by a young French diplomat who was one of the guests, represented a milliard of francs. * * * The toilettes of each one of the women was of the same hideous magnificence as that of Mrs. Harris. Upon their necks and in their hair sparkled diamonds, sapphires, emeralds, rubies, large as one's finger nail, pearls large as nuts, the treasure of half a dozen Rajahs. These fine looking women had complexions that spoke of exercise and of hours passed in the open air. They drank dry champagne and spoke at the top of their voices, with just that little touch of a nasal twang that brought to mind the staccato chatter of a cage of exotic birds."

M. Paul has the pleasure of traveling in that thoroughly American institution, the manager's private car, and says he:

"Ah, what a singular recollection have I carried away with me of my little moving apartment equipped with all the meaningless minutiae of comfort, of the bath-room, of the dining-room where we three sat down to discuss a delicious terrapin prepared by a black cook. A library of two hundred volumes attested with what perseverance Mr. Harris, during the enforced leisure of his travels, worked away at the great task of self-culture. Culture! It is the one huge word that is forever in the mouths of Americans, and they apply it with equal irony to their moral as well as to their physical life. 'Ethical, physical, culture.'"

Such are some of M. Bourget's conclusions. They are interesting mainly because they are from M. Bourget's pen. But we should not consider them as new to us because they are new to him. The Harris' are old types in American fiction, and if they become of more than passing interest in the "Deux Menages" of this great French analyist, it is simply because they are seen from a new point of view.

PAUL BOURGET IN HIS STUDY

ITALIAN OPERA

First Performance of Ponchielli's "La Gioconda" at the Tivoli.

"La Gioconda" did not attract an overflowing audience to the Tivoli. In the matter of opera the local taste is conservative, even where a thunder and lightning of advance advertising has cleared the air. Only the glamour of striking personality or individual local interest makes musical audiences bestir themselves to appear in force. Ponchielli's opera deserved more interest from its reputation as a successful composition, and for the pains given to staging and playing it by the Tivoli management.

First-night performances are never expected to be of the best any company can give, so that the impression gathered was not influenced by omissions and commissions of virtues or defects in the performance itself. It ought to be insisted upon that all concerned made the most of themselves under the circumstances, even the long and short-limbed houris of the chorus being persuaded into gyrations of more or less operatic meaning. There was no special feature made of the ballet; in fact, that side of the performance was considerably cut in submission to the hardly earned knowledge that local ballets are more to be endured than enjoyed as terpsichorean efforts.

Venice, a picturesque list of personages and a lively action to boot, made a possibility of entertaining hope that the opera would reach within hailing distance of its reputation. The first act laid hold of the interest peaceably enough, not so much from its stirring quality as from the hopes it aroused that something more tangible might follow, but with the close of the second act and the finale of the third act came the conviction that something very much more powerful than the intrinsic value of its own musical and dramatic interest would be needed to galvanize the mass into vivid or coherent life. The libretto, one of those opera operaish affairs, has every excresence of Italian opera from the days of 1830, with the honorable barcarolle, the perennial Ave Maria, the prayer and the invocation made indespensible to the Italians through the triumphs of Rossini, Donizetti and Verdi. In the second and third acts these musical forms bobbed into the libretto with ungovernable nonchalance. Only a swinging waltz aria was lacked to make the resemblance to a dressed up concert complete. Done by some master of opera staging the tale of the street singer and her mother might have been made brilliant and drawing to the opera-goer's emotions, but these scrappy and patchy scenes dragging in time-honored musical gems by the scalp set loud and long the yawns agoing. After the moving drama of "Cavalleria" and "Pagliacci," not to speak of Wagner's dramas, the interest of "La Gioconda" can be only musical, of its story is a hash up of Italian opera themes meant to be seasoned by effective music. Plenty of blood and thunder, but no living, simple emotion.

In the purely Italian opera of Rossini, Verdi, Donizetti, and the tender Bellini, there is a quality individual to each composer as a musician, and that is the musical physiognomy of their separate melodic gift, which enables any appreciative person to become familiar to the point of recognizing the type. Mascagni has this gift, and Leoncavello, too, though in him it is more thinly spread, but Ponchielli, though an excellent musician with invention enough, apparently has it not. This gift of melody stamped with a quality all its own, no matter what its calibre, is the first jewel of a real composer, and is not to be robbed from him by comparative criticism or analysis, and remains inviolable, a thing to be felt and perhaps never undertsood. Not that Ponchielli is unmelodious; no, he has the flowing of agreeable intervals, but that is only the husk of real melody, and its spirit never appears to him. Liszt and many other masters were denied the sense, and the world, though paying homage to their intensity and tenacity, forgive them and forgets.

Wagner had been more or less studied by Ponchielli, but studied without the result of catching the spirit of agitating dramatic fire, stirring in the massive yet fragile meshes of that enclosing orchestration. Nothing but the magic of great personality in the singers and the divine gift of song would carry this opera through with sustained interest. The frequent lapses from a broad manner into the happy hunting grounds of the trashy and tawdry in rythms and tunes, the ragged orchestration and the bathos of scenes meant to be tragic, obscured appreciation of what there was of novelty of harmonic treatment.

Mr. Mertens, Miss Holmes and Mme. Kronold did what they could to galvanize the work into life, but without much genuine success, though the public was omniverously appreciative. "The Flying Dutchman" will be better suited to the company, and will repay the hard work and fatigue the singers undergo in the rehearsals and performance.

LESLEY MARTIN.

There is more catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and, therefore, requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from ten drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly on the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address:

SEPTEMBER MAGAZINES

The Array of Subjects, with Certain Comments on Their Treatment.

Just now the magazines search as far after features as the Sunday supplements. True, they do not construct strange artistic structures down the center of their pages—wild-eyed designs, often enough clever, smart, but always startling and inevitably freakish, as one finds in the "Journal" or the "Herald." No, the editor of the monthly will be respectable at any cost, and is sensational by having the man of the hour discuss the subject of the moment. We all know the Klondyke has had the eye and the ear of two continents for two months. The "Century" in August proved unwittingly very timely with John Muir's article about Alaskan glaciers, which was really intended as a contrast to the hot spell of mid-summer. Now, here cometh the "Cosmopolitan" with the old views of Chilkoot and Lake Linderman, which we have all learned to know so well, illustrating an article by Robert Oglesby. It is good enough, this article, though with the daily broadside from the press one hesitates to pursue the subject further. "McClure's," however, has gone to headquarters, not of the Yukon, but of Dawson, and has an article detailing the personal experiences of Joseph Ladue in interview form, with some fine views that the weeklies had not published. It records the return to his old home in Plattsburg of the rich prospector and the intense weariness of his manner in talking about the Yukon. He had really grown tired detailing his unique good fortune, and on the Sunday of the interview he went out and hid in the barn to escape the delegations of his neighbors who had come to discuss the situation and look at his nuggets.

Though there is nothing about gold fields in the "Century," it has, to the writer's mind, rather the best of the magazine set this month. There is a most commendable variety about its subjects, though the same verdict applies to the menu of "Harper's," which is also ahead of the mark and has to its credit at least one good story, "Her Majesty." I read first Mahan's "Twentieth Century Outlook"—rather a disturbing prophecy to us on the Pacific Coast as to the possibilities of China. This is evidently a deeply considered paper, and embodies a greater degree of thought than is often spent on the monthly contribution of the distinguished writer. Captain Mahan declares ill-founded and dangerous the idea that this nation or any other may abandon the sword for the ploughshare. Far distant is the time of delivery from the expense of standing armies and great navies. Of the Chinese great things are predicted when the immense latent force of that nation's character is aroused. The development of the Turkish and Egyptian armies under modern discipline show what may be accomplished with the raw material of the East, and Mahan points out that persistence and staying power are potent factors in the making of fighters, and these China possesses in a higher degree than either the Japanese or the Indians. As to our own country, Captain Mahan declares that the narrow policy so long pursued of mere internal development must end, and that the United States must emerge their isolation and take the position among the nations of the world to which their responsibilities call. He advocates a colonial policy, especially the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands. On top of this declaration of the necessities of war, I passed to Professor Hollis' essay in the "Atlantic" pleading for a reorganization of the naval forces of America. The hackneyed but inevitable problem of the relative standing of line and engineering officers is boldly confronted and a remedy suuggested that seems to a layman competent to the exigencies of the predicament. It is evident that some such solution must be found if our navy is ever to attain prominence among the nations.

Apropos to the "Atlantic," there are some excellent essays in the September number. One of the most intelligent is that of Henry Childs Merwin, who deals with certain social aspects under the head of "The American Notion of Equality.' It is so customary for writers to sneer at the rich that one is at once interested in the statement that 'the fact that a man has made much money implies as a rule that both his mind and physical strength are far above the average." That wealth is the passport to the best society the world over, Mr. Merwin asserts is less true in America than England, and less true in Australia than it is in America, for the reason that in England the best society is a state institution and can afford to be more hospitable, not only to wealth, but also to intellect and originality. Every individual in a complex society has his position, and the missionaries of Boston report that a social gap exists between the peanut-man and the perapatetic organ-grinder, and the children of the former are forbidden by their parents to play with the children of the latter. It is encouraging to learn on the authority of Col. Carroll D. Wright, of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, that while the rich are getting richer, the poor are also. The poverty of the present is not the poverty of the past. Even pauperism is not as abject. An excellent study is Theodore Roosevelt's "The New York Police Force." This is really a self-celebrated triumph, but it is full of material and facts, and shows what may be achieved by sturdy, persistent and constant application of civil service rules. Municipal reformers should certainly read this article; if is also distinguished by vigor of statement and conciseness of style. The only personal articles in the magazines are the glimpse of Gladstone by Harry Furniss in the "Century," and an appreciation of George Du Maurier by Henry James in "Harper's." Harry Furniss is member of the "Punch" staff, and is called the creator of Mr. Gladstone's collar. He says that the statesman was once invited to meet the artists at a "Punch" dinner. Instead of wearing the flowing collar which Furniss had made famous, he appeared in a straight-up-and-down one of the "masher" type. The creator was much aggrieved, but was consoled by an editor who told him he had seen Gladstone at a dinner the night before, his shirt frayed at the edges and the collar pinned down behind. The pin gave way after a time and the collar nearly came over his head.

Henry James is subtle, delicate and indirect in his estimate of Du Maurier. He pictures him as the most delightful companion, and says he had numbers of stories put by for use. Among these was a plot that had for its basis the career of a pair of lovers who had been changed into albatrosses, and the idea of whose romantic adventures in the double consciousness strike James as a real trouvaille. They are separated, they lose each other in all the wide world; they are shot at and wounded. One of them resumes his original shape watching and hoping in vain for the wandering and distracted other.

The editor of the "Cosmopolitan" has an idea that he must comment on the utterances of his contributors. He attributed to the first of Julian Hawthorne's famine articles a meaning and animus that the context did not convey. Now it is Ouida who falls under his lash. She writes a thoroughly Ouidaesque tirade against feminine athletics, bloomers, short skirts and high boots, as opposed to fluffy hair and dainty, delicate ways. We all know this writer is nothing if not exaggerated, and is read for her manner of statement rather than because of her judgments. For instance, she denies that the corset is doomed, and declares that in society no lady can afford to be seen more than twice in the same toilette without losing caste. The sporting woman is "a hybrid animal—an exaggeration and a caricature of the sporting man; her mania for field sports much more injurious to her maternity than the drawing-room gowns condemned as hostile to her natural functions"—and so on. the editor appends a note regretting that the brilliant mind of his contributor should conceive or announce such errors, assuming, I presume, that his readers will consider him responsible. A writer who signs his own name is presumed to be answerable for the statements he makes—that is the etiquette of magazinedom. Judging by the article on the making of the "Cosmopolitan" in the present number, which reads as though composed by a bookkeeper, there is in the establishment rather more presumption than tact. However, these defects must not blind one to the interest of this magazine, which contains the first installment of a new story by Julien Gordon, written with a John Oliver Hobbs air, besides the usual meagre installment of Wells' remarkable story, "The War of the Worlds." Hawthorne's report on famine is fine descriptive narrative, and its horrors are relieved in this installment by a most charming Oriental interlude:

At the further end of the village was a well—a large opening, ten feet across and more than twice that depth, with a low stone wall built around it. Fortune so favored us that, as we drew near, we saw a bevy of girls about the well drawing water. There were four or five of them, all young and all beautiful, for they were Branmin girls; and though the famine had begun to howl at their doors, it had not yet actually seized upon them, and they showed none of the familiar symptoms—their bodies were slender, but not emaciated. Their costume had the flowing grace of line and the richness of harmonious coloring that one sees only in the East; there were bangles of silver and gold on their delicate wrists and ankles; their eyes were dark, soft and brilliant. Drawing water is perhaps the most becoming act a beautiful young woman can perform; and these girls were types of perfect bodily grace. Their skill was also delightful; they let the pitcher down by a string to the water, filled it with a turn of the wrist, and then pulled it up so deftly that in its swingings it never came in contact with the projecting walls of the well. Having set it on the margin, they would fill another and yet another; then they would lift the first to their head, and place the others, tier on tier, on the top of that; it was a long and shrewd reach to place the last. But they made no false movement, and spilled not a drop of water. All being settled, they gathered up their glowing drapery and walked away with a step and bearing that were like rythmic music. And before they passed quite out of sight round the corner, they turned their heads with a slow, imperial grace, and sent back over their shoulders a dark, serious, yet bewitching, glance. They were Rebeccas, every one; and it was easy to sympathize with the ardor of Jacob—his constancy seemed inevitable.

Nothing in these magazines, however, approaches the splendid prose of Arthur Symon's "Rome," in the August "Cosmopolis." That is veritably a tour de force. Noted originally as a writer of graceful verse—somewhat erotic in manner Symons has latterly been represented by prose, critical and reminiscent, contributed to the "Saturday Review" and the English magazines. His style is quite the most distinguished among the younger men, and unquestionably he is to be reckoned with as a great literary artist. The comparison of Raffael, Michel Angelo and Pinturicchio, and the description of a sunset on the Campagna are inimitable and linger in the mind like a delicious landscape.

There is a pretty little story in the September "St. Nicholas" about a little girl in England 300 years ago, who recited some verses before Queen Mary. It is called "A Girl of Winchester," and is written by Virginia Cabell Gardner. C. T. Hill has an article, "Floating Fire Engines,' telling how fires on the water are extinguished. There is a complete story, "A Brave Little Coward," and a sketch on "The Street Dogs of Constantinople." An article of interest to Californians is "'Flower of the Almond and Fruit of the Fig," by Mary Hallock Foote, descriptive of the pine and fruit belt of Northern California.

TURF TOPICS

State Fair Prospects — Pacific Coast Jockey Club Stakes.

With the opening of the State Fair at Sacramento next Monday the local interest in running races will begin for the season. The meeting in Agricultural Park at the Capital City will be the last to be held on that site, as the property is to be disposed of for building purposes, and a new track will be built further out of town. From all appearances the coming meeting will maintain the improvement that has been shown in the sport at Sacramento during the last two years.

The trotting events promise to be interesting, and the competition of the stables which have been performing on the Montana tracks with those that have been racing on the local circuit ought to furnish some good contests.

The Fair extends over two weeks, and will be immediately followed by a week at Stockton.

The prospects of a good meeting at Los Angeles from October 14 to 23 are said to be excellent, and as the management spares no pains in providing inducements for owners of horses to enter for their liberal purses, provided for both gallopers and trotters, and at the same time caters judiciously for the comfort of the public who attend the races, their efforts should be well rewarded. The list of running stakes is overburdened with short distance races, and it would have been better if more events at a mile and over had been provided.

---

The Pacific Coast Jockey Club list of stakes for the Fall, Winter and Spring meetings, 1897-98, will be published in a few days, and will include ten stakes, the first of which will be run on the opening day, November 1, entries closing for the whole of these events on October 15. A further series will close on November 15. As previously stated, the total value of the stakes to be offered by the club will be even more liberal than last season.

Owners should bear in mind that twenty of the stake events, of which particulars have been published by the California Jockey Club, will close on the 20th instant.

In the meantime there is a good deal of quiet preliminary work being done amongst the local stables, and when the State Fair is over most of those in this part of the State will begin active work in the way of "readying" the members of their strings for the coming campaigns at Ingleside and Oakland.

---

Unless things change a good deal before the season closes in the East, we shall be left considerably in doubt as to the relative merits of the more prominent performers. Hamburg is still entitled to be considered the best of the two-year-old division, while the two three-year-old sons of Friar's Balsaw, The Friar and Voter, have proved themselves high-class race horses. The performance of the former in the Brighton Cup—2¼ miles—carrying 115 pounds, when he made all the running and won in 3:56½, with a neck to spare, was a great feat for a three-year-old, and perhaps the best record at that distance, all things considered. The talent are in many instances disposed in consequence to give The Friar pride of place over Ornament as the three-year-old champion of this year. The latter has never performed so badly, however, as The Friar did early in the season, and it seems too soon yet to forget what Ornament has done and how he has done it.

---

With the view of ridding the turf of inferior horse flesh, the Queen City Jockey Club of Newport, Ky., fixed the following conditions for a race last Saturday: "The Scully purse; $300, to go to the winner; for three-year-olds and upward; the winner to become the property of the Queen City Jockey Club, and not to race again; 5 lbs. below the scale; seven furlongs." If the proviso had been extended to every animal entered it might accomplish the object, but to impound the winner alone seems to be beginning at the wrong end.

Reference was made recently to the expressed intention of the Secretary of Agriculture to visit the West, and, amongst other matters pertaining to his office, to look into the horse-breeding position with the view of directing attention to the European demand for cavalry horses. Mr. Wilson has made his tour and is said to be hopeful of being of some assistance to breeders. In furtherance of his plans he states that he has agents engaged in gathering information in Europe as to the stamp of horse required. This of course sounds well, but surely men who have any horse knowledge at all must understand this already. The chief trouble is that so many, who have no idea whatever and never will have of what a good horse should be or how he can be produced, are engaged in the breeding of large herds of no value beyond their hides. If the Government could direct the sources of reproduction, as is done to some extent in other countries, it might be possible to raise the standard of the produce, but otherwise little good can result from Mr. Wilson's praiseworthy efforts.

STALLED IN GENIUS

The Enchantment Wrought by a Great Violinist.

Throughout the Rocky mountains and the valley of the Missouri river the rain had fallen in torrents, and the roadbed of the Union Pacific was a veritable quagmire. With much labor and trouble the trains had crawled to Glinn's Ferry, in Idaho, but there the news awaited them that the trestle across Indian creek had been wrecked. Five limited expresses were stalled there in the wretched little village, and there they remained a week. An extraordinary conglomeration of people were concentrated there—society women and tourists—recruits, cowboys, prospectors, school teachers—but there was nothing for it save to accept the situation, make the best of it, and of the wretched food which the railroad eating house provided. There were diversions, however. On the third night in Glinn's Ferry—it happened to be St. Patrick's day—the railroad men and their wives and mothers and sweethearts proceeded to get up a dance. There was but one obstacle to their success, and it was the absence of the fireman who usually officiated as fiddler. A car-cleaner who was interested in the affair was told by one of the passengers that there was a queer-looking, long-haired chap in one of the drawing-room cars who had a fiddle box among his traps. The car-cleaner was tickled over this news, and looked the passenger up. He found a fat man with an oleaginous countenance, a broad, high forehead, and a heavy mop of Liszt hair sitting in the smoking compartment dreamily puffing at a cigarette.

"Say," said the car-cleaner to the passenger, wading right into business, "a feller out here tells me that you've got a fiddle along with you, and so I suppose you know how to play on it. Do you?"

"A vairy lettle," said the oleaginous man, with a strong foreign accent, smiling.

"Well," went on the car-cleaner, "we're going to have a dancing shindig over to the hall to-morrow, St. Pat's night, and there's nobody in the place to give us the fiddle music. Now, I wish you'd help us through, will ye, hey? Not for nothing, of course. We used to give our fiddler, when we had one, $4 for a night's playing, and we'll do the same by you, and be a heap obliged in the bargain."

"I should charmed be to play not for anything at all," replied the passenger with the mop of hair. "A pleasure, a pleasure—for nothing at all—for no $4—for pleasure only."

"Well, that's so much the better," said the car-cleaner, "and we'll certainly all be a whole lot in your debt for accommodatin us."

The fiddler with the foreign accent and the mop of hair turned up promptly on time, smiling vaguely when he came in and sized the thing up, and reporting to the wife of the locomotive engineer, who sat at the tinpanny piano, for instructions. She had an old book of dance tunes arranged for violin and piano, and she had turned down the corners of the dances to play.

"These folks are mighty particular about time," she said to the man with the fiddle, "and you've got to be careful not to play too fast or too slow. Just you follow me and we'll get along all right."

The fiddler listened to her smilingly and respectfully, said he'd do the best he could, even if he had never seen the music before, got out his fiddle, tuned it with the piano, and stood ready. The first number was a waltz. The two musicians got through with it satisfactorily, the woman at the piano showing a determination to lead in the matter of time, the fiddler falling in with her determination quite smilingly as he played. He appeared to be able to play the dances pretty well for sight reading, though not much better than the average fiddler; but his instrument certainly struck my ear as being a singularly fine one, with a powerfully deep and sweet volume. Well, anyhow, they played the dances for fully an hour and a half, the mop-haired fiddler receiving the direction and adjurations of the pianist, whose music was surely distressingly thrummy, with the very greatest air of courtly deference and obedience.

"Then, a couple of minutes after a waltz had been finished, the surprise—the shock, I ought to say—was sprung. The violinist—no longer the fiddler—had begun to play; very softly and tenderly at first, 'way down on the G string, like a 'cello or a contralto voice. Great Scott, such music! I had never in my life heard anything like it—anything to compare with it. It was strange to watch the people in the smoky, lamp-lighted hall after the first few bars of the music reached their ears. They stood like people turned to stone and looked as if they hardly breathed. The violinist stood at the piano, a greasy smile on his fat face, oblivious to everything—he was playing the violin. The pianist sat paralyzed on the piano stool, looking up at the violinist's face. From the low, mournful G-string music he leaped with a tornado crash of his bow to the very bridge on the E string; and on that string he painted us, for five minutes, some musical pictures of rushing cascades and stormy seas and marrow-chilling deviltry of all sorts, such as I don't suppose any of us shall ever forget. Then slowly and gradually he worked down to the meadows again on the lower strings, softer and sweeter all the time, until the thing wound up with a moan.

The violinist took his violin from his chin dreamily and looked around like a man that didn't see much after all. It was fully thirty seconds before there was any movement whatever on the part of any one in the hall. Charley Fair, son of the late United States Senator from California, advanced from the amazed crowd on the floor and stepped up to the violinist.

"Monsieur Ysaye, surely?" said he.

The great violinist smiled oleaginously.

"I caught just a glimpse of you on the steps of the Bohemian Club in San Francisco the other night," said Fair, "but I should never have recognized you here—had it not been for the music."

NEW STORIES RE-TOLD

Mark Hanna returned to Washington the other day to transact some important business. In order to avoid interviews and unnecessary questions he registered at a suburban hotel as Henry Josselyn. Rejoicing in momentary peace he went into the garden. There a colored porter came up to him: "How d'ye do, Senator," he saluted. "You're mistaken," was the reply. "I'm not Senator Hanna." "Why, Mister Hanna, I knows yo' like yo' waz my daddy. Ain't I dun worked fer yo' out at yo' fact'y in Ohio? This nig dun had too many of yo' fifty cents to forgit yo' name, Mister Hanna." "That's all right," said Hanna, taking a crisp, green bill out of his pocket, 'but, Sam, I've got some very important business on hand and I don't want any one to know I'm here. So you take this, carry up my valise to my room, and don't you say a word about my name being Hanna."

"Right you are, sah," and Sam was off. "Here you," said he to the clerk in the office. "Give me Senator Hanna's things dar." "Mr. Hanna's things are not here," said the clerk. "These coats and that valise belong to Mr. Josselyn." "Deed they don't boss. Those dar things belong to Mr. Hanna, from out in Ohio, bes' white man this niggar ever knowed, but he dun tell me he have some very important business on hand an' he dont want no one ter know 'bout it, so he dun write some highflutin' name on de book, but he Senator Hanna all right." In an hour Mr. Hanna was interrupted by a reporter's card, and in the papers next morning there was a column and a half about him and his presence in town.

President Lincoln once told a good story on himself anent the amount of terror in cold steel. It was during his younger days in Louisville. He was walking along a back street about midnight, when he was suddenly confronted by a tough-looking individual who suddenly sprang before him flourishing a weapon apparently three feet long. Seeing that his victim seemed to take considerable interest in the proceedings, the burglar finally yelled out, as he steadied his knife close to the young man's throat: "Stranger, kin you lend me five dollars on that?" "I never reached in my pocket and got out money so fast in all my life," said Mr. Lincoln. "I handed him a bank-note, and said: 'There's ten, neighbor; now put up your scythe.'"

M. Thiers retained in official life all his bourgeois habits. One day while breakfasting at the palace, he drew towards him a large fruit dish, which ornamented the center of the table, took a peach and preparing to cut it, said to his neighbor: "Shall I give you half of my peach?" Mme. Thiers had been looking at the peach with an indignant air. "I thought," said Jules Simon, who narrated the story, "that she was angry with her husband for not having known enough to wait for the servants to pass the fruit. But that was not the trouble, and, unable to contain herself any longer, exclaimed: 'But, mon ami, those peaches are for dinner!'" The President docilely restored the fruit to the dish. (The Century.)

On one occasion during the civil war, when Sherman and Grant came together for discussion, Mrs. Grant happened to be present. "Perhaps you don't want me here," she said, "listening to all your secrets?" "Do you think we can trust her, Grant?" exclaimed Sherman, casting a shy glance at Mrs. Grant. "I'm not so sure about that, Sherman," said the commander, entering into the spirit of the fun. "Public documents in disseminating items of information are accustomed to say, 'Know all men by these presents.' I think it would be just as effective to say, 'Know one woman,' for then all men would be certain to hear it."

In his book, "Origins of Contemporary France," it was generally felt that Taine was rather severe in his treatment of Napoleon. As may have been expected, the work wounded the Bonapartists keenly. Princess Mathildo was a friend Taine, but when his book came out she sent him her card with the formula P. P. C.—pour prendre conge—to signify that their relations were at an end. But M. Taine wittily translated it "pour prouver colere," and brought the laugher over to his side.

The Duke of Cambridge is notably the most homely member of the English royal family, and though possessed of most agreeable manners, is said to be the ugliest old gentleman in London. A story is told that when he sat for his portrait to Mrs. Leslie Cotton he exclaimed on looking at it, "Surely I am not as ugly as this," to which the pretty artist, who is a New York society woman, with a characteristic nod, replied, "My pictures have many faults, but they are always true to nature."

The Duchesse de Chevreuse was one of the few women of the old regime who rallied to the First Empire. One evening she attended a ball at the Tuileries, and entered the room absolutely blazing with jewels. Napoleon in his own peculiar way went up to her. "You look magnificent, Duchesse," he said; "are all your jewels real?" "They are not, Sire," was the reply; "but such as they are they are good enough for this place."

The late General Salamanca, who was a wit of great fame in the Spanish court, is quoted as explaining to an English gentleman in Madrid the substantial differences between Spanish Liberals and Conservatives. "The Liberals," said General Salamanca to the astonished foreigner, "are assassins and great robbers; the Conservatives are robbers and great assassins."

SENATOR MORGAN AND THE RAILWAYS

If Senator Morgan bids adieu to California with an impression that the great body of the people of this State feel grateful for his attitude on the railway funding bill, then we must thank the "Examiner" for creating the impression, and for undertaking what otherwise might have been neglected, viz., his entertainment. That journal, with its customary vigor and enterprise, made a prodigious effort to work up an apparently voluntary public demonstration in the Alabama Senator's behalf, and, accepting its own reports as fairly representing the enthusiasm of its coterie of followers, it succeeded admirably, taking everything into consideration. At the "mass" meeting, which was held in a measure as a public reception to the Alabaman, Senator Morgan was invited to speak upon the railway funding bill. This he did, at some length, in his characteristic style, but his criticisms fell most heavily upon the Union Pacific foreclosure proceedings, which he roundly denounced. Unfortunately the heart of the California agitator does not thrill over a discussion of the abstract proposition of refunding, nor does the plight or the policies of the Union Pacific Railway interest him. What he wants is abuse, and lots of it, directed exclusively against the local railroad builders. As the distinguished gentleman's abuse was largely confined to the Eastern road it was naturally disappointing. Besides this, the subject of refunding has been so thoroughly threshed out, here in California, it is not surprising that the speaker found himself unable to throw any additional light upon the subject or advance any new arguments to sustain his side of the controversy. Indeed, it would baffle the ingenuity of a Philadelphia lawyer to invent any new grounds in that behalf, but much may be truthfully said, that remains as yet unsaid, in favor of refuding the debt upon some basis —fair, equitable and businesslike.

There can be little difference of opinion among business men as to what should be done by Congress to secure to the Government the full amount due to it, but the payment of the debt would be as disappointing to the "Examiner" as would its volnntary abandonment and liquidation by Congress. The California agitator does not want the Government to receive its money one-half so strongly as he wants the Government at any loss to take the property out of the hands of its present owners. His solicitude for the Government is not genuine; he is merely expressing in a negative way his hostility towards the gentlemen who now control the property. He takes no heed and has no thought as to how best to collect the money; he simply desires to wreck, and, if possible, ruin those whom he is pleased to hate. This accounts for the otherwise inexplicable sentiment that finds expression here. Whatever object Congress may ultimately determine to accomplish, whether it be the collection of the debt in full or the wrecking of the present corporation at an expense to the Government of tens of millions of dollars, there are only three courses open for it to pursue. These are refunding, foreclosure, or the purchase of the first mortgage, and, thereafter, Government ownership. Two of these have already been proposed, and both have brought violent objections from the Senator from Alabama. If that gentleman should find himself forced to disapprove of the third and only remaining course, he will also find that he has involved himself in a dilemma from which he can only extricate himself with difficulty.

The amount of money involved in this question is very large, but we should not permit that fact to becloud the issues, nor should we permit prejudice to mislead judgment into a quagmire of difficulties.

These facts are very simple, and may be briefly and simply stated thus: To aid in the construction of a transcontinental line of railway from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, Congress offered to loan to the builders of such a road a certain number of bonds per mile for each mile of road so constructed, and to take a mortgage which should constitute a first lien upon the railways so aided. This was the first proposition, but it was rejected by the railway builders. At the next session of Congress the bill was modified and permission given to the several railroads to issue bonds and to mortgage their roads in an amount not to exceed the amount of bonds advanced by the Government, and Congress consented that this newly authorized private debt should constitute a first mortgage upon the property, and the Government debt a second lien. This proposition the railways accepted, and, under it, the roads were constructed.

Thirty odd years have elapsed and the bonds are falling due. Congress ordered the railroad companies to set aside a certain portion of their earnings annually as a sinking fund for the liquidation of their debt, but the sum proves inadequate. The companies now confess their inability to meet the balance of the debt, and ask for an extension of time which will permit them to make annual payments until the entire debt is obliterated.

The question is, how should Congress proceed? As we have said, there are three courses open to it, any one of which it may pursue. (If any one can suggest another course we will be duly grateful.) First, the Government may investigate the actual earning capacity of the involved lines, and, having accurately ascertained the amount of money such lines are capable of earning annually, may refund the debt upon a basis that will compel the companies to pay to the Government each year an amount equal to their estimated net earning capacity. We are not prepared to approve of any specific refunding bill that has yet been introduced before Congress, for we have examined none of them; but we are prepared to declare and to maintain against all the world that if the object sought is to secure the return to the Government of the money due to it, and if Congress' sole desire is to collect the money and not to wreck the corporations, a refunding bill along these lines is the only sane, practical method of collecting the debt. More than a year ago we prophesied that the time would come, if refunding was finally defeated, when this State would take on all the habiliments of sorrow and regret that it had ever opposed such a measure. We prophesied the "Examiner" would declare that the railway companies were not sincere in their desire for a refunding bill, and we now reiterate that prophecy with emphasis. By legislative instructions we have tied the hands of our Congressional delegation so that they must oppose a refunding of the debt no matter what shape or form it may take, no matter how fair or how advantageous to the Government it may be. This is sheer idiocy.

The second course open to the Government is to foreclose its lien. But it must be remembered that the Government debt is a second lien, and that the first mortgage falls due concurrently with the Government bonds. It is notorious that, in these days of cheap material and improved methods of construction, these roads may be duplicated for an amount much less than the face of the two debts. It is doubtful if under the hammer they would bring an amount sufficient to liquidate the first mortgage. The first mortgage is the first that must be satisfied, and whatever of residue there may be after satisfying that debt goes to the Government, but not a farthing more. The entire loss, be it great or small, falls wholly upon the owner of the second lien, which in this case is the Government. Certainly a properly guarded agreement to pay the entire debt in annual or semi-annual payments would be more businesslike than such a hazardous proceeding. But the Alabama Senator does not fancy this method of dealing with the matter any more than he does the refunding plan. Foreclosure finds some favor here in California among those who hope the road might be bought in by a new syndicate, but the hope is idle. The Government would certainly suffer a loss of between twenty and thirty millions of dollars, and in all likelihood its purchasers would be its present owners. There are physical obstructions in the way of a stranger's bidding on the property that need not here be dwelt upon. Certainly no prudent man, anxious to secure payment of the debt in full, would ever endorse the foreclosure plan. If the property was worth the face of the debts and bidders were at hand, such a course might be entertained, but under existing conditions it is wasteful, unbusinesslike, and is the suggestion of hate and prejudice rather than of common sense.

There is but one other course open to the Government to pursue. It may reach the property and wipe out the first mortgage debt by paying the holders of first mortgage bonds some sixty or seventy millions of dollars and then proceed to take possession of the roads and operate them as a Government institution. This plan also finds favor among the socialistic element of California, but it is impossible to conceive that Congress, which represents a nation of intelligence, would ever look kindly upon such an innovation. Yet, if Senator Morgan and the "Examiner" oppose refunding, and object to foreclosure, the only legs left for them to stand upon is this monstrosity, "Government Ownership."

THE QUESTION OF FEMININE EDUCATION.

BY GERALDINE BONNER

Mabel and Edith are two little girls of fourteen. They have just begun their school year, one at boarding, one at day school. They were home for the Sunday last week, and in a casual meeting the question was put:

"Well, how do you get on at school?"

They both assured the questioner that they were progressing with remarkable speed.

Mabel—she is fat, healthy, pleasure-loving and amiable—said she was devoting herself to Latin and algebra. She had soared beyond the realms of geography, history and all such primary studies. Edith, who is younger and fond of books, had also put away childish things. She treated Latin as an episode of her frolicsome, unregenerate past, brushing it aside as a trifling study upon which her youthful mind had once unbent itself. She was studying English literature through the medium of Chaucer. Edith was wrestling with the Canterbury Tales, and she said she liked it.

The questioner—a gentleman with ideas of his own on the education of women—tilted back on the hind legs of his chair in silent dismay at the intellectual precocity of the coming woman.

"But you haven't given up geography altogether," he pleaded. "You do take a course of American history, don't you?"

"Oh, we haven't given them up," said Edith, "but we've gone through So-and-So's history, and we'll finish the atlas this year."

"Finished a history and gone through an atlas! That's not so bad. Let's hear the name of the President That's not so bad. Le.s hear the name of the President. just before Lincoln, Edith? And you, Mabel, tell us the States the Mississippi River runs through?"

But Mabel and Edith were so frightened by this suggestion that they put their hands over their ears.

"Oh, don't ask us such things as that," they cried in alarm. "Those are dreadfully hard questions," and their peace of mind was so upset that they departed.

The gentleman and the fourth member of the party were left alone to cogitate upon the problem of the Higher Education.

"And that's the way they educate girls," he said, with a melancholy wave of his hand to the door whence the little girls had withdrawn. "They teach them that sort of thing and then want to give them the suffrage, and expect them to compete with men in the great professions. Latin and algebra! Chaucer and the Canterbury Tales, and geography and history done with at fourteen!"

The gentleman was launched on one of his favorite subjects. He had had great theories on the future of Women. He held that given the same advantages of education they would be the equals of men. He believed in them as doctors and lawyers, but when he met those who were he did not seem to like them. He maintained that education should be the development of some special talent or aptitude—developing the female mind in "the line of least resistance," he called it; the subject upon which it was least obtuse and dull.

"The whole defect of the feminine mind," he said, dejectedly, "lies in the training. They've got a mind all right enough, though they're sometimes very cunning about hiding it—like lunatics, you know, who are always trying to hide the things they need most."

His companion was a woman and was more skeptical. No one can be more skeptical about the mental capacity of women than an intelligent member of the sex. She seems to think she's got it all. This particular woman did not believe in the ordinary female having a mind. It was unnecessary, perhaps useful as a third leg or an extra eye might be; but as one got on very well without it, it was better to remain in a state of imperfect, but pleasing ignorance.

"Of course, that sort of teaching is nonsense," she said, "and so much money thrown away on it! Women ought only to be taught housekeeping, dressmaking and physiology, so that their children won't die of neglect, or they themselves become invalids from their own ignorance of how to take care of themselves. Outside of that what is called education is time and money thrown away."

The gentleman demurred at this. He thought that would make society a very dull place. "Good Heavens," he said, spreading out his hands in a despairing gesture, "there would be nobody but men to talk to! It's hard enough now to talk to an ordinary woman, but if she knew nothing but housekeeping and amateur therapeutics she would be fearful. The world would be .ull of Amelia Sedleys. All the men would go into monasteries, and the human race would die from off the face of the earth."

"That's just like a man," said his companion. "You only look at this great question from your own little personal standpoint. Whether a woman is dull or interesting, captivating or repelling to a man, is not of any consequence. Her fitness to discharge her duty to her own children and to the sphere of society in which she is placed is the whole question. And the modern form of education is more calculated to unfit her for this than to prepare her. At school her head is crammed with odds and ends of useless knowledge which she soon forgets, as she learns nothing thoroughly. While her brother is being slowly and laboriously taught his profession as a lawyer, doctor, clergyman, or actor, she is mixing up in her poor befuddled brain a little algebra, a little Latin, a little Greek, a little literature, a little music, a little chemistry, a little botany, a little French, a little German, and so forth and so on. If you want to see what good all this has done, try and make her talk on any serious question. She won't know a thing about it. Ask her to play on a piano—she has forgotten how. Talk French with her—she won't understand you. Thousands have been spent in teaching her things that she forgets at once, because she has no reason to remember them. Not a penny has been spent on teaching her what she ought to know to fit her for her vocation in life."

"But you would make women nothing but housekeepers and trained nurses—excellent things in their places—but I don't think their place is the domestic hearth. We want something a little more versatile and companionable there."

"You've got the average man's horror of the nurse and the housekeeper because you've only known amateurs. They are terrible—try so hard to keep the house clean and tidy that they end by driving the people out of it. They make such a fuss, and make themselves sick and everybody uncomfortable, because they don't know their business. A clean woman at fifty has generally become an expert housekeeper. It has taken her twenty-five years to learn her trade, and she has had nervous prostration half a dozen times and turned her husband's hair gray in the interim. You ought to hear her talk and see the awful picture of domestic life she draws! Half the reason the New Women are not marrying is because of the terrifying descriptions the Old Women have given them of what awaits them as heads of houses and managers of husbands rendered desperate by the discomfort of their homes."

"Well," said the gentleman, subduing his voice to a confidential pitch, "I've always had my doubts as to whether things weren't more satisfactorily arranged in the times of the troglodytes. There were no domestic troubles then. The husband came in and sat down to his meal while his wife cowered dutifully in the corner. If he was in a good temper he threw her a bone. If he was in a bad one he beat her with his club. Most of the female skeletons among the cliff and cave dwellers were found with fractured skulls. I'm not sure that wasn't the Golden Age. It certainly was for the husbands."

"You can't fracture our skulls now. You can't even sew us up in sacks and throw us in the Hellespont, which was a longer way of doing things, but much quieter and cleaner. Short of these good, old means of getting out of the difficulties, educate the ordinary ones of us properly so that you won't want to fracture our skulls or sew us up in sacks. Teach us our business of housekeeping and taking care of children, as you teach the boys their trades."

"And the clever ones, the ones that you feel sure have got the minds, the ones that you feel might have amounted to something, if only they hadn't been sent to school? Are they, too, to become trained nurses and housekeepers? I shall feel quite reconciled to getting old and dying. I always did hate the idea of a millenium."

"No—let them alone. They'll grow up right, as they were intended to, like a flower in the sun, if only people will try and not educate them. If you crush their imaginations and stifle their originality with your school systems, you'll wipe them out altogether. No great imaginative mind ever sustained the grinding it got between the upper and the nether millstones of a high-priced boarding school and a woman's college. Books and the society of intelligent people—not necessarily cultured, but intelligent—is all they want. Then you stand by and now and then direct—just bend a leaf straight that was growing crooked, and where the sunlight is obstructed move the obstruction away. By and by, if an untimely frost doesn't nip it or a blight come upon it, you will see it grow into a very beautiful flower."

FICTION IS SELECTION.

By JUSTIN STURGIS

To the man who has ever so modestly assumed the pose of a writer of fiction is given a certain experience which is usually trying, sometimes amusing, but that on rare occasions is profitable and entertaining to the last degree. People who wish him well give him "ideas" for stories, come to him with the remark "here's something you ought to make into a story," or "there's a character you ought to put in a book." More often than otherwise they clinch their recital with the remark: "This really happened, you know," as though it were any better for actually having happened. Take, for instance, a case like this: A very good friend of the writer's, a capital chap, but without the sense for fiction, tells him a yarn of a romantic elopement. As usual, he says, "this is something that actually happened, you know." Here is what actually happened: A young fellow is in love with a girl—parents on both sides opposed to the match—relentless. Young couple decide to elope—secret appointment at the gate at the bottom of the garden—carriage and horses there—start for the flight—pursuit—girl's brother on a horse (black for preference)—pistol shots exchanged—black horse of pursuing brother killed—down he goes with a hideous sliding clatter—next town is reached and marriage performed—subsequent reconciliation, etc., etc., etc. "Now isn't that a story for you?" he exclaims. "That actually happened at—" and he names the town and backs up his story with all manner of detail. "There's a story you ought to write," says he, in conclusion. No, indeed, not if the copy were paid for at the rate of twenty-five dollars per hundred words. The thing may have happened. There can be no doubt that such stories have happened. But the truth of a story in this sense of the word has nothing to do with its availability, from the point of view of good fiction. In a written tale it would not seem real. It would seem like a rehash of some tawdry yellow-covered romance of fifty or a hundred years ago. Fiction is what seems real, not what is real.

But for all this, the story writer must go to real life for his story. You can never think out, or invent or imagine a tale that will be half so good as the things that have "really happened." The complications of real life are infinitely better, stronger and more original than anything you can make up. The only difference is in the matter of selection of details. The story writer's position in regards to the life of the world is like that of a maker of mosaics in front of a vast pile of tiny many-colored blocks. He don't make the blocks nor color them—the story writer does not invent nor imagine the parts of his story. Writer and mosaicist alike select and combine. The maker of a mosaic has a design in his brain, or, better still, infinitely better, sees in the pile of little colored blocks in front of him a certain little group or tiny heap that, by merest accident, has tumbled into a design of its own. The design is rough, very crude, the blocks do not fit together, and here and there a green or blue or red block jars in the color scheme. But, for all that, there is a suggestion of design there, much more original than any design he could work out. Well, he takes this group of blocks in hand, picks out and throws away the red and the blue and the green that jar and fight, trims off the edges of the blocks and makes them fit compactly together; perhaps a gap or two is left. The whole vast heap is at his command. Deftly he goes over it, picking out here and there the blocks that he needs, a circular one here, a triangular one there, now one of a bright vermillion, now one of a sombre grey. Little by little he pieces together that crude and rough design, gets everything to fit, everything to harmonize; possibly he combines the first design with another; possibly these two designs suggest a third still better; so he proceeds. At last the final design is complete. A little polishing, a very little, for in roughness there is strength and in sharp contrast, vividness; and there you are, a rounded whole, a definite, compact and complete thing, taken out of and isolated from a formless heap and jumble of shape and colors.

There may be—in fact, there is—in the heap a hundred and one other combinations of forms and shapes already arranged, "actually existing," made to hand, as it were, but the designer over-passes them because these combinations have been used by other designers before him, used so often that there is no longer any originality or freshness in them.

Some one objects at this point: "What about imagination? What about fancy? What about invention?" There is no such thing as imagination. What we elect to call imagination is mere combination of things not heretofore combined. The designer, before his heap of mosaic blocks, can only pick and choose. If he is daring enough, thoughtful enough, careful enough to combine two colors that have never before been combined, or two shapes never before fitted together, we call it "imagination." It is only observation, after all. The designer does not make his little blocks, does not color them. They are already made and colored for him. The fiction writer of the wildest and most untramelled fancy cannot get away from real life. Imagination! There is no such thing; you can't imagine anything that you have not already seen and observed.

Like the skilled mosaic maker, any one with an eye accustomed to looking for short stories can run his glance over the heap of things we have elected to call life and here and there see combinations of form and color that are original, telling and worth working up. Such a one would not have given the elopement combination half a thought. The design may be in the heap, almost perfect as it lies; the story may have really happened; both are worthless for all that. Sometimes, however, the design does not exist at all except in your brain; you must go to your heap nevertheless. Here, for instance, is an "idea" for another kind of story. It has never happened, but it was told me by a man who has the fiction-sense rather keenly developed. Observe the difference between it and the other one of the elopement, but bear in mind that this last story is yet in its crude original state—needs, in fact, no end of handling and piecing and rearranging. It's a mere handful of blocks, so far. A Jew—sweats old clothes in a sordid basement—a wretched benighted man, squatting all day cross-legged in that sordid basement—has a wife no less sordid than himself. The Jew has no emotions, no fancies, no illusions. There is no poetry in the man. He sweats old clothes. Has not seen the country in fifteen or twenty years. However, in front of his shop stands a poplar tree—tall, very beautiful. Jew has a sort of blind, unreasoned attachment for the tree—looks at it in the evening after he is done with sweating old clothes—has watched its leaves come and go with the seasons—loves the tree, but don't know why—hardly knows that he does love the tree. All the starved poetry of the sordid man's life is centered about the tree. One day the tree is suddenly cut down—consternation—something gone out of the Jew's life—don't know exactly what—becomes morose and gloomy—goes from bad to worse—develops latent melancholia—insanity perhaps—quarrels with the sordid wife. All his peace of mind and little happiness gone—goes from worse to the worst of all—one day kills the sordid wife without knowing why—is adjudged insane and straight-jacketed in a sanitarium—would it all have happened if the tree had been left standing?

THE FAKED MINING BOOM.

The audacious newspaper stories, or to call them by their proper name, "fakes," which have sent crowds of ignorant and credulous people to Coffee Creek are almost played out. There are more men coming out than going in, and, although the daily press of San Francisco still hammers away on the marvelous finds it does so to no purpose. Of all the hundreds of people who have gone in there with their brand new shovels, picks and pans, not one has succeeded in panning out fifty cents, while only one man is supposed to have found a ledge, the value of which is entirely problematical. On the other hand, there is a crowd of disappointed and angry individuals on Coffee Creek, cursing the newspapers. These senseless and erroneous reports have induced many an unfortunate fellow to throw up a good position to join the mad rush, and sent many another toiling up the long and dusty seventy miles from Redding in an almost tropical sun. Many of them will have to beg their way back. The newspaper reporters have all taken their departures, and it is perhaps as well; many a man has been tarred and feathered for doing far less evil.

And may we ask these newspapers whether, even apart from the great individual hardship entailed on so many unfortunate people, they have not made themselves and the State ridiculous in the eyes of the whole civilized world by this most preposterous boom? Two men named Graves discovered a pocket out of which they and the newspapers said they took 175 pounds, later 217 pounds, of gold, worth $40,000, $50,000, $68,000. The pocket at once becomes a mine, and for about a fortnight these men posed in San Francisco as the heroes of the hour. If the reporters tell the truth, each paper was given a slightly different version of the way in which the find was made. At last, the gold is paid into the Mint and melts down into some $18,000. Are not the public, and especially the unfortunate victims of this huge fake, and even the newspapers themselves, entitled to some explanation of this mysterious discrepancy? The entire discovery went into the melting pot. Take also the other marvelous find—that of Burgess and Murphy, of $80,000! Let us do these men the justice to say they never lied about their discovery; they left that to the newspaper correspondents, for the $80,000 turned out to be about $300, and the pocket appears to be worked out already. If all accounts are true, the Graves brothers' "Jay" mine is in the same condition. What is to be said now to the thousands who are reported to be on their way here from the East to participate in the fabulous riches of "Old" Trinity? And, by the way, why "Old" Trinity? Neither the county, nor its inhabitants, excepting the Graves brothers, are in any way to blame for this most foundationless boom. The responsibility is with the newspaper correspondents who invented the stories, chief among whom is the correspondent of the "Call" at Redding. If that paper be sincere in its professions of abhorrence of sensationalism, it had better give that gentleman a wide berth in the future, "for the truth is not in him."

In a couple of weeks Coffee Creek will be as it was before. A large number of shovels, picks and pans will have been disposed of at about one-quarter of their cost; the Graves brothers will have resumed operations on their "Jay" mine; the "Call's" fisherman will be employing his time when the fish will not bite by taking out $15 to $20 to the pan; the "Examiner's" man will be groundsluicing the bass of the Trinity River, trying to solve the simple problem of how you can move anything, unless you have some place to put it, and wondering why he never thought of that before; while the "Chronicle's" man will be engaged in sinking a drift mine on Coffee Creek on a capital of some $200 to $300, thinking it really very unreasonable of the water to rise in his shaft as he sinks, and wondering the while how many five-thousand-dollar humps he can buy for $200.

Rather amusing the "Call's" tilt at the Mission Zoological Gardens. Amusing remembering the connection of the Spreckels family with the Mission which fathers the project and the strenuous support given it by the "Call" prior to the change of regime. There were double-column editorials lauding the idea in Mr. Shortridge's paper, more energetically appreciative than the assaults with which the editorial columns now teem are violent. Then it was absolutely necessary that the Zoological Garden be established; now, the city has all the pleasure ground it requires in Golden Gate Park. Mr. Spreckels declares further that the price demanded for the property is far above its value and that the entire project is a job. This form of argument is not popular at the Mission and Improvement Clubs and other organizations are meeting them and denouncing, by resolution and word of mouth, the "Call" for its opposition. Under such circumstances there is sure to be a loss of circulation and I don't believe the community in general, however grateful it may feel, is going to buy the 'Call" by way of thankfulness. Antagonizing a section is sure to provoke a loss and rarely achieves a reciprocal advantage. That was something the late Loring Pickering had learned by experience. However, we all want a Zoological Garden. It would be a tremendous attraction to the city. San Francisco is the metropolis of the country west of the Rockies and the miners and farmers of that great region come here for their fun. Germans go to Berlin to see the Kaiser and the lions and to London to look at the Tower, Parliament and the "Zoo." After you have smelt Chinatown and the Sutro plaster-castery has been unveiled unto you—what is there to see in San Francisco? The tourist industry grows more a factor in the prosperity of the community and it is as good sense to establish a "Zoo" as it is to bituminize Market street. If the owners ask too much money for the so-called "Gum Tree Tract" it is easy for the city to condemn the property. Then the rate may be established by arbitration and no one need cavil. The Park Commissioners favor the idea and the entire Mission wants it, and when you have a section up in arms for a project it is better to "stand in" than to "throw stones," as Colonel Irish puts it.

CARVILLE

A Quaint Village of Abandoned Street Cars on the Edge of the Pacific.

The idea of converting an abandoned street-car into a domicile is strictly Californian—as original as the house-boat life of Belvedere Bay or the slave traffic of China-town. When you think of it, there is no reason why some such use should not be made of these obsolete vehicles with their glazed sides and varnished panels. Yet there is nothing about the style of them as they were borne through the streets in other and older days to suggest this ultimate purpose of their being. Who, though, sees his old clothes in the white paper of the morning journal, or mere coal in the gas flame which illuminates his dining-room. Of the availability of a street-car for living purpose there may be a question—but of the adaptability of the structure there is no doubt—not, at least, after a visit to Carville. Carville is on the verge of the Pacific Ocean, and on the northwestern edge of Golden Gate Park. It is founded on the sand dunes, and its residents are free of the sea breezes and the sunsets. Before them the Park strtchs out its vistas of dark green; around them are tawny sand dunes—a veritable Sahara billowing away to the hills. To the west the Pacific stretches illimitably its bright wastes of blue waters. An admirable site surely—a seaside resort within a stone's throw of San Francisco.

Carville and its cars belong to Adolph Sutro. You may occupy a car there, lease it even, at the rate of $5 per month. You may convert it to domestic purposes, furnish it elaborately, but you cannot purchase it or its site for love or money. The location, thinks Mr. Sutro, who is a man of much foresight, has a future. What other great city has a seaside resort at its doors? he wants to know. Here is a London with its Brighton in the suburbs, a New York with a Narraganset Pier on its water front. Why, it will be worth millions yet. The plutocrat of the twentieth century will have his villa here rather than on Pacific Heights or at Burlingame. Indeed, Mr. Sutro, who had the imagination to build the biggest and ugliest baths in America, and a Cliff House that looks like a fortified dry goods box, has but to close his eyes and see a vision of pale pink palaces embowered in verdure along the boulevard stretching over the sand dunes to the gum trees in the distance, and all paying tribute to his foresight. This is the ocean beach according to Sutro.

Just what may be done with a plain, ordinary bobtail street-car may be gathered from the picture of Mr. W. M. Coward's domicile as depicted above. This is a summer villa—the swell show place of Carville. It is hung with portieres, equipped with a dining table, a tiny kitchen, and all the other domestic attributes. Its outfit of furniture and trappings cost $150, and really the impression you have of the interior is quite sumptuous. It might be a Pullman car, or a cosy corner in a plutocrat's mansion, or something equally luxurious—if you can think of it. Here cometh the owner every Sunday armed with the materials for the Sabbath dinner, and he and his family enjoy the ozone and the freedom of beach, park and sand dunes. If he chooses, he may live there the week through—as Captain Dailey does. The Captain is a gentleman of prominence and education, who found himself a few years back broken in health and out of pocket. There was a bit of a hut set out on the edge of the ocean which he obtained leave to occupy, believing that the fresh, free air of the Pacific was endowed with healing virtues which the atmosphere of the city proper did not possess. An invalid veritably, though young in spirit, he made the hut his domicile, and ever since he has waxed strong and hearty, regained his lost health and secured a new lease of life. The little cabin has been transformed into a quaint residence ornamented with the spoils of the sea. Behind it are stacked up timbers and shells and cocoanut husks and innumerable other articles of flotsam and jetsom. A dining-room has been scooped out of the sands and around the walls grow flowers. But it is the collection of bottles you will look at with the deepest interest. Such an array of bottles standing in every corner and embrasure of the establishment, every one of them picked up by the Captain in his morning tramp along the great, broad beech, which curves in shining reaches away to Lake Merced. He will tell you of the charm of life on the ocean shore and assure you that the sea fogs have their abiding place, not on the water's edge, but amidst the chimney pots of the city. He will descant to you of renewed vitality and buoyancy of spirits gained from the sea breeze.

Otherwise Carville is not now a center of population. Mr. Coward, Mr. Fitzgerald, Captain Daily and a ladies' bicycle club occupy its villa residences. There are vacant domiciles by the half-dozen, but you are requested to bring your own bedding and other utensils of living, for such are not to be found on the premises, and the shops do not deliver goods so far from the city limits.

A ROMANCE OF RICHES

The Picturesque Rise of the Great Goelet Estate.

As an instructive and picturesque instance in the matter of cause and result it is curious to note that Louis XIV., the grand monarch, the roi soleil, was most instrumental in the founding and building of one of the largest fortunes in America. Had not the Grand Monarque revoked the edict of Nantes the Huguenots would not have fled his kingdom, would not have sought a refuge in far distant America, and a certain one of their number, Jean Goelet by name, would not have come to the city of New York in the year of grace 1685 and invested the remnants of a small fortune in real estate in that new little town.

Fleeing from Paris with a band of fellow Huguenots, Jean had headed for the Flemish borders, where, unfortunately, the band was stopped and turned back into a country wherein to linger was to die. And in due course of time the band did die, suddenly and most violently, were set upon by French cavalry in Picardie and cut down. Jean only managed to escape, hiding in swamps and forests and traveling only by night. Finally he reached the coast, and embarked for the new world in a trading packet.

In New York he was made a hero of. He was a Frenchman with all a Frenchman's graces, had a little money left, which was a marvel, and furthermore was considered almost in the light of a martyr, persecuted by the Catholics for righteousness sake. Truly a picturesque figure. At least a certain Miss Canon believed him to be such, for she married him a few years later and brought him a considerable fortune. Jean bought land, and dying bequeathed it to a son, who improved it, bought more, and bequeathed it to his son, Peter, who soon became the head of the largest hardware store in the colonies. Peter soon got out of this business. Perhaps the raid made upon his store for powder and arms at the outbreak of the Revolution sickened him of the business. At any rate he sold out and began buying land as his father and grandfather had done. He bought lots out in the country where Fortieth and Fiftieth street now run and held on like grim death, watching the city slowly growing out little by little, and values at first doubling, then tripling, then quadrupling.

And so it went down the line to the father of Ogden Goelet, recently deceased, who, so soon as the family fortune came into his control, added to it, true to the accumulative instincts of his race. And not only doing this but erecting upon his lands—lots they became now, worth more dollars than it would take to pave them—buildings of really magnificent architectural splendor. Also he loaned money upon lands, and when the debtor failed to meet his obligations took the land in question. And so in course of time, here a little and there a little, the Goelet estate reached out and included block after block in the very heart of one of the largest cities in the world.

It was not all acquired easily and when once acquired was not invariably retained. Goelet was cutting a wide swath and soon hit up against another man quite as big as himself. Vanderbilt was the other man's name, and over a certain piece of particularly choice property there was a battle royal between the two great millionaires. Vanderbilt won. The property in question was that upon which the Grand Central Depot now stands. Vanderbilt made an offer and Goelet laughed in his face.

"Very well," said the railway king, "that land suits me exactly, and I guess I'll have to get it." Vanderbilt fixed things with the Legislature and the property was condemned for railway purposes. Goelet made remarks, but thereafter entertained a sincere and profound admiration for Vanderbilt as the only man who had ever bested him.

His next brush was with Tweed. It was a fight still memorable among real estate "operators." Tweed wanted Madison avenue continued to the south till it should intersect Broadway, and attempted to put his scheme through despite Mr. Goelet's opposition. Tweed had no difficulty with the Legislature, who backed him up resolutely. But Goelet had learned his lesson, carried the case to the Appellate Courts, and there, where Mr. Tweed's "influence" was for the moment on the wane, won.

And now the last scion of this great house is dead, and his pleasure yacht—the liners were no larger ten years ago, those of to-day are not so exquisite in appointment—is bringing his body home to the city he helped to build. The Mayflower is perhaps the finest private yacht in the world, furnished as she is with two sets of triple expansion engines of 4,650 indicated horse power that send her through the water at a 14-knot gait. Her crew number a hundred, and her length 321 feet over all. Her interior is, singularly enough, furnished in the style of the family's one implacable enemy, Louis XIV., with heavy oak moldings and scroll work, heavy plate glass windows and panels decorated by the best French artists. The rooms of the owner are under the fore end of the bridge deck. It is more like a drawing-room in a mansion than a stateroom on a steamer, and is connected by telephone with all parts of the ship. Mrs. Goelet's room adjoins, fitted in rose pink and sage green. The promenade deck is nearly 200 feet long by ten in width. The casings of the funnels and ventilators are of teakwood, which is also the material used in the deckhouse and smoking-room.

A Case for Lombroso.

By FRANK NORRIS

This story is to be about young Stayne and a girl named Cresencia Hromada, and it harks back to that fable of Æsop's about the two jars. You remember that fable of Æsop's about these jars. They were superlatively beautiful jars, and they were floating in a cistern. They made the discovery that so long as they kept apart they were safe — the moment they should come together they would break and fill and sink. Haec fabula docet and all the rest.

Young Stayne, when I knew him, before the time of this tale, was as fine a young fellow as you could find between the two oceans. He was just out of Harvard, where he had obtained "Deturs" and very particular and especial credits. He had been one of the speakers in the Yale debate, had been vice-president of the "Pudding," and had even been taken on by the "Porcellian" in his senior year. You others who have been at Harvard will know just what all this means. Stayne was a "torrow-bred" to his very boots. No man in San Francisco had more friends than he. He was not liked in the sense that a merely "popular" man is liked — he was liked because of his genuineness and his fine male strength and honesty and courage. Furthermore, he was well-looking, but that's a detail.

Cresencia Hromada (as you may have very shrewdly suspected from her name) was Spanish, and belonged to that branch of the Hromadas whose original grant from the Spanish government was large enough to make three or four counties when the Gringoes dispossessed them. She was a rare one, was Crescencia—fair as Viking, with that fairness that is the mark of the oldest and purest Spanish blood known to the college of Heralds. It dates back to the time of the Ostrogoths, and beside it the Castillians are mushroom interlopers of yesterday. Miss Hromada's dominant characteristic was her pride. She was proud of her name, proud of her family, proud of her beauty (which was a marvel), proud of her exclusiveness, proud even of her pride itself. Otherwise, she was blessed or cursed (whichever you will) with a temperament as delicately poised and as sensitive as goldsmith's scales, nerves as tightly stretched and as responsive as the strings of a Stradivarius. The odors of certain flowers giddied her, she could see eight colors in the rainbow, a musical discord made her head ache upon the instant, and she could feel the spots on a playing-card with her finger-tips. I suppose this almost hysterical sensitiveness was morbid and unnatural. She had come of a family of unmixed blood, whose stock had never been replenished or strengthened by an alien cross. Her race was almost exhausted, it's vitality low, and it's temperament refined to the evaporation point. To-day Cresencia might have been called a degenerate.

One day, when she was about twenty-one or twenty-two, she heard Stayne's name for the first time. Someone was telling someone else a story in which Stayne had shone with particular brilliancy, had done a thing especially generous, had sacrificed himself and concealed the fact. A little after Miss Hromada heard his name again, and heard it coupled with extravagant praise. Next she saw a picture of him, and his face pleased her. He was pointed out to her on the deck of a yacht, and it pleased her all the more. After this a mutual friend, who knew them both, told her that Stayne was in love with her, and spent his nights in devising ways and means to meet her. Then at last they met.

Cresencia came away from that meeting in a state of mystic exaltation, such as we are told sometimes comes upon nuns before the Stations of the Cross. As for young Stayne, he filled himself a pipe standing before the fireplace in our room, and said to me:

"Ever met that Miss Hromada? Stunning girl and clever as they make 'em. I'm going to work it to get a bid to their place during the tournament."

He got his bid right enough about a month later, but in the meanwhile Things had happened. A very proud girl, such as Cresencia, rarely falls in love with any man, but when she does it is with a proud disregard of reticence and restraint that is splendid to see. Cresencia was too proud even to try to conceal her affection for young Stayne. In ten days she had all San Francisco, from Pacific Heights to Russian Hill, talking. On the eleventh San Francisco had them engaged. Next came the tournament and the house-party at the Hromadas place that was to last a week.

Over his pipe in our room, Stayne said to me:

"Got my bid all right. I tell you what, she's a corking fine girl, old man, and no mistake. You don't know her very well, do you?"

By that sign I knew that however Miss Hromada might feel toward Stayne, Stayne would never be in love with her, for a man is not in love with a girl about whom he will speak to another man. Said I:

"Don't go to that house-party. Believe me, no good will come of it."

He looked at me a moment over his pipe, and I saw he understood.

"Wouldn't you go?" says he.

"Suppose it was your sister!"

He winced at that, and then added:

"But you know I'm not so sure about myself."

"Come now," I answered. "Seriously, now, aren't you sure about yourself?"

He hesitated, and then laughed a bit.

"Yes, I guess I am. But about Miss Hromada—is it as bad as all that? and mustn't I go?"

"It's quite as bad," I told him. "Everyone sees it but you. Decidedly, I would not go to that house-party."

"Well, may be you're right," said he; "I'll think it over."

He thought it over—and went. It was a bad business from the beginning. I was not of the party, but it was easy enough, Heaven knows, to hear what went forward. San Francisco gossip is not discreetly whispered over the teacups — it is shouted through megaphones, in public places. At the house-party Cresencia calmly appropriated young Stayne with superb, almost imperial, nonchalance. Stayne played his part in the one-sided game, and, once having made the mistake of going to the house-party, he was not much to blame up to a certain point. When a girl threw herself into his arms he was not the man to keep his hands in his pockets. Who would have been? But at the end of a week Cresencia's passion for him had become a veritable fury. The red-hot, degenerate Spanish blood of her sang in her veins, and her high-strung nerves crisped and recoiled upon themselves like the ends of broken violin strings. She used to sit in her room — so a girl told me — at night, after a dance or dinner, rolling her head to and fro upon her folded arms, or biting at the bare flesh of them, in a very excess of passion. Stayne had flirted with girls a-plenty before this time, and had gone through the mill like any other city-bred man, and usually could hold his own with the best of them. Cresencia, however, was outside this experience. A girl who would catch her breath at the touch of his hand upon her bare wrist, or go suddenly pale at his unexpected entrance, troubled him not a little.

At the end of the first week Stayne saw that the Certain Point had been reached, and invented an excuse to leave. Miss Hromada invented a better one for his staying. And he stayed. Up to this Certain Point, as well, Cresencia had been grandly unsuspicious of Stayne, assuming, as a matter of course, that he was in love with her. After the first week she was less sure of him, and her uncertainty only made her cling to him more desperately. The smash came one evening, as smashes generally come, when people least expect them, and when they are all unprepared for the crisis. Feeling, as he afterwards told me, like a kicked puppy, Stayne told Cresencia the truth — blundered it out — blurted it out, like a schoolboy. She must have been superb then. She was a born and bred Hromada, for that moment, at any rate. She rose slowly to her full six feet, her hands rigid at her side, and without a gesture or movement spoke to him for five minutes in a low, calm voice, while Stayne (he told me so himself) cowered there before her, counting the ticking of the clock, and following, with shifty eyes, the pattern in the carpet at his feet.

"Now you had better go," she said, at length.

Stayne groped towards the door, wondering how soon he could draw a full breath, and if he could ever look at himself in the glass again without blushing. By the time his shaking hand closed on the knob, the daughter of an hundred Hromadas had lapsed back into the young girl of degenerate blood and jangled nerves and untamed passions. A scene really terrible followed.

"What is it! What is it!" Cresencia would exclaim, as she held him about the neck. "It isn't love, this feeling I have for you! What is it? What is the matter with me? It isn't love, and yet there is something — something here — here — I don't know! Am I losing my senses? Why is it that I have got to love you whether I will or no? It isn't love — is it a disease? Is it a kind of insanity? Oh, what is it that has happened to me these last weeks?"

In the face of such hysteria Stayne lost his hold upon himself as well — said he did love her after all — said so while he wondered at himself — said it, half-believing it was true. In the confusion of his ideas it was impossible for him to tell truth from falsehood. He became almost as incoherent as Cresencia herself. Fancy the scene, if you can—both of them excited beyond all control, talking wildly into each other's faces, neither of them heeding what was said by the other, and all the while clasped in an embrace like that of wrestlers! There in the darkness of that drawing-room, in the isolation of that country house, the two jars, floating helplessly in ungovernable currents, crashed together. That of the finest clay shivered and sank at once — the other, of coarser fibre, settled slower to its ruin.

In a month's time Stayne was sickened unto death of Cresencia — was cloyed and satiated with her. At first he had been too honest to pretend for her an affection he did not feel, but already the fine edge of this honesty had been blunted. If he now wished to break with her it was because it fatigued and bored him beyond words to keep up appearances. Once more he fought his way brutally out of the mesh in which he had become entangled, wrote a ten-line letter to Cresencia, which he believed would be final, and for a week felt like an honest man for the first time in three months.

But the thing was not to be. Miss Hromada's pride did not come to her aid this time even momentarily. She had been degrading far more rapidly than he. Though she rolled upon her bed, hurting herself with the nails of her hands, in unspeakable humiliation she could not let Stayne go. And this was the same girl whose pride and self-respect had hitherto been her strongest traits. She managed to see Stayne three and four times each week. She came to his office, contrived to meet him on his way to lunch, managed to be invited to the same places — even began to take a strange, perverted pleasure in forcing herself upon his company and in submitting to his brutalities.

For the thing could not fail but have its effect upon Stayne. He suddenly discovered that nothing—literally and quite truly—nothing he could do would offend Cresencia. He realized that she would take anything from him—that she would not, or rather, that she could not, resent any insult, however gross. And the knowledge made the man a brute. Remember, this was not all at once. I am talking now about things that took a year or more to evolve. After he had clearly seen that Miss Hromada would submit to anything at his hands, Stayne began to enjoy her society. By this time Stayne had developed into rather much of a villain. It became for him a pleasure — a morbid, unnatural, evil pleasure for him to hurt and humiliate her. He hurt her while he sickened at the thought of his own baseness, and she submitted to it while she loathed herself for her own degradation. They were a strange couple.

Stayne would even torture her before other women and girls—would make her play waltzes while he danced with some fancied rival—would make appointments with her and come to the place with another girl, and tell her he had made other arrangements. He would smoke while she was by, and blow the smoke in her eyes. I have even seen him put his feet into the lap of her dinner gown, she, the while, trying to carry it off as a joke.

And she took all this and would go home and lie awake all night and fancy she was killing Stayne with her nails and teeth, till she shook all over and saw red things between her and the opposite wall.

The end of this story ought to be a suicide, or at least a murder, but that was the devil of it. The two people lived — lived out the wretched farce-tragedy to which there was to be no end. Had they never met, Miss Hromada and young Stayne would yet have been as fine specimens of womanhood and manhood as you could wish to know. Once having met, they ruined each other. The effect of these different characters upon one another was something well-nigh impossible to reduce to language. A Shakespere could have handled it — a Zola might have worked it out—I dare not go further with it. For all I know the horror may still be alive. Stayne's name has long since been erased from the rolls of his club. Miss Hromada is thoroughly declassee, and only last month figured in the law courts as the principal figure in a miserable and thoroughly disreputable scndal.

Stayne goes to see her four nights in the week.

UNCLE SAM'S NEW GUNBOAT

The Delegation From Wheeling at Its Christening.

Uncle Sam has a new gunboat, and the gunboat has got a new set of silver-, china- and glassware, given to it by the patriotic citizens of Wheeling, West Virginia, after which town the gunboat has been named. It is the custom for big cities like Chicago and New York to present cruisers named after them with sets of table service. But the Wheeling people have done more than this; they love their gunboat and take an interest and a pride in her that is second only to their affection for their native town. So enthusiastic have tney been that even before the keel of the new gunboat was laid a deputation from Wheeling visited the Navy Department in Washington and saw to it that she should bear the name of their city. When this concession had been granted they at once set to work to raise funds for the making, not only of the silver dinner service—the customary gift—but also for additional services of china and glassware, quite out of the ordinary, and also a mammoth punch bowl. More than this, the service once completed, a deputation was selected to convey it to the Wheeling and to formally present it to her officers.

The number of the deputation increased day by day, until when the time for departure had come fully eighty Wheelingites joined in the itinerary across the continent to see their stanch little vessel and to make the donation of the service. The California Convention Committee took the affair in hand and have seen to it that the visitors had a royal good time. Everything has gone off delightfully and the Wheelingites are as enthusiastic over their welcome and reception as they are over the Wheeling herself.

On the day of presentation of the service the tug Sea Queen met the delegates at the Mission street wharf and took them out to the Union Iron Works, where Mr. Irving Scott did the honors and personally conducted them over the huge shipbuilding plant. From the works the party went on board the Oregon, and after visiting her from bilge water to fighting tops, bore away for Mare Island, where the Wheeling and her officers were waiting to receive them. Here an excellent luncheon was served, the huge punch bowl cristened and the formality of presentation undergone. Congress Dovener, the head of the delegation, made the presentation speech, to which Captain Sebree responded, accepting the gifts of the Wheelingites and appropriately returning thanks in the name of the Secretary of the Navy, his brother officers and himself. Altogether it was a very pleasant and pretty ceremony, and even the pouring rain in which the delegation was caught on their return could not succeed in dampening their ardor over what they were pleased to pronounce one of the most delightful outings imaginable.

It is now said that instead of dying on his last disappearance, John Orth, the missing Austrian Archduke, is really living with his brother, the Archduke Louis Salvator, in the latter's retreat in the Island of Majorca. Louis Salvator makes his home in a deserted monastery in the interior of the island, and has almost entirely given up all pretensions to royal pomp and circumstances.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

The error of a popular verdict was never so convincingly illustrated as in the discovery of the Grindstone silver mines at Mercur, in Utah. Readers of "Roughing It" will remember the amusing story of the Virginia City assayer who in the days of the great mining excitement was kept busy providing miners with analyses of the ores brought him for examination. His popularity was due to the persistent optimism of the reports he furnished, though this kindly hopefulness was also the cause of his ruin. These were the gay and happy Bonanza days when men who had no mines were poor indeed. New ledges were continually cropping up and it was a poor day for Mark Twain's assayer when he did not predict a glowing future for half a dozen ledges. It is said that undiluted optimism is more irritating than unsuppressed pessimism. The day came when the community grew tired of the assayer's rose-colored predictions. One morning three prominent citizens submitted to him a section of sandstone, which they declared had just been brought in. The assayer tested it and pronounced it fifty-dollar rock. The wrath of the citizens was magnificent, for the sandstone in question had been cut out of the town grindstone. The assayer was hustled out of the State in short order. The sequel of the story shows the advantage of truth over fiction. It seems grindstones in those early days were at a premium until a deposit of sandstone was found in the Mercur Mountains, in Utah. The stones throughout Nevada were all cut from the quarry there, among them that of Virginia City. Many years afterwards a prospector was examining this quarry and discovered a rich ledge of silver ore—the only occurrence, I am told, of silver in a sandstone formation. He located the property and sold it subsequently to the Walker Brothers, who have had from there many hundreds of thousands of dollars.

The oratory at the Morgan reception in Metropolitan Hall Monday night was interesting, less from what was said than because of the manner of saying it. To my surprise the Senator departed from his reputation and devoted himself to reviewing the several Refunding Bills and the action of Congress on Hawaiian affairs. The eagle did not scream especially loud nor did the tail of the British lion get tangled in the Senator's grasp. It cannot be said, however, that the great man either interested or amused his audience. Our own statesmen appeared to better advantage. Senator Perkins' speech was a revelation. Though always instructive and sensible, he used to have rather a didactic manner of address. This has entirely disappeared. He expressed himself with the vim and snap of a clever debator, making each point tell vividly. His brief address was full of animation and intelligence, and he must have been flattered at the very warm reception which he was accorded. Maguire's oratory has certainly improved under the tuition of Congress, which is really the greatest debating society in the country and easily the best college. Many a man has gone to Washington a lame and impotent speaker, and has returned with quickened wits, having acquired a facility at talking on his feet that no course in the greatest university could have conferred on him. The atmosphere and the exactions of that body bring out of the individual whatever of thought or force there is implanted within him. He hears the best speakers in the country daily and has the opportunity to model himself after their style. The changes wrought by this discipline are especially notable in the instance of Senator White, Apropos of mining I am told that the Boston company which has been developing the properties in Tuolumne County known as Whisky Hill Group, has in the Santa Ysabel property struck rich ore. This concern has demonstrated its faith in the Mother Lode by erecting mills and reduction works which rank with those of the Gwin mine as the most complete in California. Their investment represents many thousands of dollars, but the recent strike will go far towards repaying it. The ore of the Santa Ysabel is low grade, but patches of this rich rock occur at intervals. Some fifty thousand dollars were taken out, and there is as much again in sight. The South Paloma mine, near the Gwin, is another property which promises a big return. The shaft is down 700 feet in excellent rock.

When the late Judge Hoge was elected to the Superior Court the idea that the Supreme Court might fail to agree with his verdicts never entered his mind. Some few months after his accession to the bench the Upper Court did reverse a decision he had rendered and he was intensely put out. Being of a frank, even positive, turn of mind, he expressed his opinions about the intelligence of the Appellate Judges and showed so much sensitiveness on the subject that his friends took to joking about it. One afternoon, accompanied by a friend, he was walking up Post street to the club. On the other side of the stret a group of Supreme Court Justices were standing, evidently waiting for a car. The friend remarked, "There go those fellows who reversed you." Hoge replied, shaking his cane at them, "Yes, hang them, but it took four of them to do it."

If Editor Shortridge had only endowed the columns of "The Call" with some of the humor he infused into his letter on passes which the "Post" had Thursday night there is no doubt that journal would have had the success it failed to achieve. The communication is deliciously funny; it is quite the most amusing article I have seen in the dailies in many a moon. It is insouciant, gay and unprejudiced—is veritably a classic. Mr. Shortridge is much more of a humorist than he has had credit for, and when he appears to be most serious is having the best time with himself. I remember his directions to a new man who had not mastered the gentle art of short editorial paragraphs as practised in the "Call." "Old man," said Mr. Shortridge in his kindly, familiar way, "the public don't care what you and I think about the war in Egypt, but if you tell 'em the Prince of Wales is a dude they'll read it. But you must say it quick. Write a sentence, fall out the window, crawl upstairs, write another, and then send 'em both to the printers, with big spaces between, and you'll earn my money."

Talk not of roads, of good roads, until you have visited Amador or Calaveras counties. They are a revelation, those roads, to and along the mother lode. There cannot beworse highways in the world. Ankle deep in dust to-day they are knee deep in mire in winter. Detestable in August, they are impassable in January. The stage travels like the Israelites in the desert, preceded and enveloped by a cloud of dust. Within the unfortunate traveler is tossed back and forth, shaken up and down, jerked hither and thither as the coach tumbles and quivers amidst the ruts and boulders. It is a terrible experience. Emerging after a journey from Ione to Jackson one feels like a jelly and looks like a tramp. Then it is in order to inquire why they are so, these roads. The answer comes—they are the result of a mixed population which makes the mountains and the mines only a temporary stopping place and flits with its earnings to Austria and Italy when the day of retirement arrives. Before election day the cry of the man ambitious to be Supervisor is "Good Roads," but once in—he conserves the credit of the county and lets the traveler grumble and suffer. The policy is worse than criminal—it is fatal to the future of the region, for what impression of favor or confidence can the stranger capitalist receive from such a bumping as he undergoes should he travel between Valley Springs and the Mokelumne river. He must assume that a community which permits such a condition must lack energy, foresight and ability, and he refrains from putting in his coin. Amador's bad roads and the worse roads of Calaveras have lost millions to the State.

Prince Luigi of Savoy has shown the pluck that was in him and quite refuted the theory of race degeneration which has so often been built upon the examples furnished by the scions of continental royalty. He has accomplished a feat hitherto deemed impossible and has at last stood upon the summit of Mt. St. Elias, where no human foot before his has ever been planted. The first news of the success of the expedition was received by Mr. Mark B. Kerr of Oakland, with whom the Prince and Lieutenant Cagni had frequent consultations prior to their start. This country is very familiar to Mr. Kerr, who in 1890 made an attempt to scale the mountain. The route he prescribed they followed closely with the results already announced. It is a long and hard journey and the Seward and Newton glaciers are probably the roughest in the world. The sudden storms and fogs which arise in this region as well as the heavy avalanchees render the ascent hazardous and the success of Prince Luigi is the more remarkable as he reached the summit at noon, when the snow is more apt to slide than at any other period of the day.

Really there is something in a name—Shakespeare to the contrary. In Oakland there resides an enterprising person who advertises "Healy makes men's shirts, nightgowns and ladies' underwear cheaper than anyone in Alameda county. Send for prices." I sent for a price list. It is undeniable the rates quoted by Healy were low. To the address the card denoted I repaired, and found myself in a Chinese workshop with a score of perspiring Mongols bending over noisy sewing machines. A smiling Celestial advanced and greeted me. "What you wantee?" he invited. "I want to see Mr. Healy—is he here?" I replied. "That's me—me Healey," he answered, smiling more broadly. I was taken aback. "But Healy is Irish—are you an Hibernian Chinaman?" He laughed. "No, no. Me no Ilish. My name Hi-li. I call him Healy—that's good." Judging by the busy air of the establishment it seemed to have been.

NEW JOURNALISM IN LONDON

A General Shaking-Up Among the English Newspapers.

Staid, sober, respectable, gray London has been startled out of all composure of late by the sudden advent in our midst of a new element. Something that has come with a whoop and a bang and as it were in a blaze of fireworks. We London-living Americans are familiar with the type, but it is passing curious to note how the London burgher regards the daily newspaper when printed and published according to American ideas. American journalism has besieged, stormed and carried by assault the very citadel of conservatism and sobriety, and it is on the cards that the "English" newspaper is doomed. Either that or it must change its policy and become Americanized.

The "Daily Mail" is the paper that has set all London by the ears, and Alfred C. Harmsworth, its editor, is the man who is responsible. Harmsworth is Oxford-bred, and is barely turned thirty. Ten years ago with the ink scarce dry on his diploma, he came to London and "reported" on the Daily Graphic for fifteen dollars per week. But this wasn't good enough for the "coming editor," so he started a paper of his own, an unspeakable rag, but edited with intelligence and pushed with vigor. Its feature was the absurd puzzle or missing word imbecility, successful solution whereof involved two hundred and fifty dollars. To-day "Answers" has a weekly circulation of 600,000, and brings in the young Oxonian an income of $500,000. But in the meantime Harmsworth has founded, launched and sold at enormous profits paper after paper, though it is only in the Daily Mail that he has adopted American methods, it was with the advent of the Mail that we remembered what American journals were, and realized how hopelessly dull the other London papers had become. The Telegraph, for instance. We had fancied that this was the brightest, lightest, newsiest sheet in Europe, with its Clement Scott, its Edwin Arnold, and its war correspondent, Mr. Bennett Burleigh. But a diet of Clement Scott is like the "plain, substantial fare" of the country novelists. Edwin Arnold's editorials on Japan became wearisome on the three hundred and sixty-fifth day of the year, and Bennett Burleigh is not the correspondent he was at the time of the Russo-Turkish war. Yet the Telegraph had a sort of glittering reputation for being a "great paper," and we read and rather believed it was until Mr. Harmsworth showed us all how a paper could be edited.

The Chronicle, too, had a great name (among the poor watchmakers and small trades-people of Clerkenwell) and that, too, we sometimes read, especially when the Lloyds took it up and ran it as a rival to the poor, dear old inoffensive Daily News. It got hold of Mrs. Besant and her Mahatma, did the Chronicle, and worked them for copy and put its circulation up a peg till the Mail exploded its bomb of special cables, live reporters and editors who were broad awake. The Lloyds thought the reduced price was the thing, and started to reduce, when a little note from Harmsworth informed them that should they do so he would start up a rival to the Lloyd's Weekly—another concern of the Chronicle's editors with a circulation of a million, and run it off the news stands. The Lloyds dare not "call the bluff," and the price of the Chronicle is yet unchanged.

The Morning is another paper that, however, is not quite so somnolent as its "loathsome contemporaries." Mr. R. Dennis, an American, is its editor and belongs to the new school. The Morning is a half-penny Conservative paper, and though its contents sometimes look like the work of amateurs, still it is fairly alive. Chester St. Ives, who made his reputation by an abusive letter to Gordon Bennett, started it in '92. He also was an American and had American ideas as to journalism, but they were ideas of so radical a character that his partners bought him out after three months of frightful squabbling. The Daily News dozes on serenely to its ultimate death, patronized by some of the dear, old Liberal grandpas, who will read it so long as it opposes Salisbury and appears regularly. Rich men can afford expensive amusements, do afford them in fact, and this, I suppose, is the raison d'etre for Mr. Astor's Pall Mall Gazette, which costs our unpatriotic countryman some hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year. Mr. Astor, no doubt, finds the thing amusing, and he is the one to be suited. The P. M. G. is deplorably, hopelessly heavy, as serious as if written in a church, as solemn as if printed in undertakers' parlors. But it will live—at least as long as Mr. Astor's money lasts.

There are a fistful of other papers edited in the same lethargic, listless, sleepy fashion, and which, from time to time, we buy and read and, perhaps, mistake them for good exponents of the art of journalism. There is the Echo, for instance, which Mr. Edwards, its editor, is forever selling and buying back; the Sun, Tay Pay O'Connor's paper, as worthless a sheet from the news point of view as ever was printed. The St. James' Gazette, whose stuff is made up from the Times, and last of all there is the old Times itself.

How the Times gets along and maintains its reputation on a circulation of only 50,000 is one of the wonders that will never be explained. In its office dispatch and promptness are punishable by loss of salary; energy in news-gathering is regarded as little short of criminal; a "scoop" would warrant dismissal, while anything that remotely suggests a "pushing," aggressive spirit affects its dear old flannel-wrapped, tea-drinking grandmother of an editor, "Baksheesh" Bell, with a spasm of nerves. Important news items are kept for a week in the offices of the Times and allowed to ripen before they are given to the public. News telegrams are thoroughly tested and sifted, pondered and considered throughout a day or two ere being surrendered to the compositors. I heard a story the other day of a man who actually called upon "Baksheesh" and asked for a place. "Baksheesh" glared at him in unspeakable astonishment for a few minutes, and then dismissed him after taking his name and address. Probably the applicant would not have got thus far had he not come armed with a letter of introduction from the Archbishop of Canterbury. Three months later the audacious applicant received a blank to fill out, stating his name, age, college, politics, and his command of foreign languages, but nothing as to former experiences or adaptabilities. He is still waiting for his appointment.

But for all this the Times is the biggest of the lot, and if news—real news—is to be obtained, obtains it regardless of any and all considerations. It has no reporters, in the American sense of the word, and its local news is worked up by agencies antedeluvian in their methods. But in its "specials" it is, perhaps, unequaled the world round. It makes its own paper and casts its own type and machinery, and even goes so far as to recruit its employees from certain farming tenants at Bearwood, its proprietors' country-seat. The Times has got many a peerage for its political favorites, but never such an honor for its editors or owners. The late Mr. Walter, its founder, told me on one occasion that he would rather be known as the proprietor of tne Times than as a "Knight," or "Lord," or "Bart."

Into the midst of these stale and staid London journals the Daily Mail has descended like a bolt from the blue, overturning and scattering them right and left, high and low. Harmsworth has made several flying trips to the United States, and has come back each time more than ever determined to make the English people "sit up" by publishing a paper along American lines. He has discovered to them the value of "scareheads" and captions, of local news and special dispatches, of energy, and vigor, and push, and enterprise, without silliness or sensationalism. And he is making his paper go. Its circulation is increasing by thousands every week, while its "contemporaries" stand by, open-mouthed and stupefied, as their own circulation dwindles in proportion. Only the Daily Telegraph has commenced to follow suit, startling its readers last Sunday with a "scarehead," a thing hitherto unknown on its pages. It was a turgid, clumsy, bungling "scarehead," almost pathetic in its awkwardness. Yet, still it was a "scarehead," and as an "entering wedge" we of the American colony who know what a live newspaper is, have hailed it with delight. Already the other dailies show signs of an awakening. England copying from America would be a strange sight, but now that Alfred Harmsworth has launched the "new journalism" it is a thing we may confidently expect. Either that or the Daily Mail will be the only real paper published in Britain. ELLSWORTH.

The worst of the Indian famine is now past, but it will be some time before the loss to the people in seed, grain and cattle can be made good. The direct loss of life from starvation has been unusually small, but the effects of long-continued privation will tend to swell the death rate by low fever and cholera. There are four million persons employed upon relief works, but this number is not a large percentage of the two hundred and fifty millions of India when compared to the far larger proportion of the English population which is permanently in receipt of poor relief. In making this statement is must be remembered that the strong family and caste feeling of India renders official poor relief in ordinary times unnecessary. The support of their own poor is uncomplainingly borne by the people, and the vast numbers who flock to relief work include all those who have lost in the prevailing distress their customary benefactors.

THE NATIVE SON MONUMENT.

A Veritable Work of Art Commemorative of Admission Day.

For the first time in her history San Francisco can claim a really artistic public monument that is the work of a real artist and real architect, and not the jobbery of a contractor and "designer." Last Sunday with the simplest and most unpretentious ceremonies the Admission Day monument, a gift of the Mayor to the Native Sons of this city and State, was unveiled at the intersection of Market, Turk and Mason streets.
